MR. EDITOR: Allow me space in your valuable paper to correct or contradict the statement made by your correspondent, Mr. Wm. B. Lewis, of Mound City, Kan., in your last week's issue. He says in his article that Prohibition prohibits in Kansas, except only in a few cities like Leavenworth, Wichita, etc. Mr. Lewis's statement looks very absurd to a citizen of Kansas, and is far from the truth. On the contrary, I am bold to say Prohibition does not prohibit in Kansas, and I will giv you a few facts to prove my assertion. At the fair held in Atchison last fall there were many saloons run openly in the city, without the customary green screen up at the door. On the fair-ground there was a large stand where eight men were kept busy dishing out beer to the thirsty crowd. At the reunion of old soldiers held in Topeka last fall there was beer sold within two blocks of the capitol. I speak from personal observation. Mr. Lewis would only hav to visit any railroad depot in northeastern Kansas to satisfy himself of the falsity of his statement. All a person has to do in Kansas is to send his hard-earned money to Missouri and his order is speedily filled, either for beer or whisky, and by the empty beer cases and kegs around the railroad stations it looks as if Prohibition did not prohibit by any means. I will state that I am opposed to the saloon and consider it a curse wherever it is allowed to exist. I am also opposed to hundreds of thousands of dollars going out of the state of Kansas, as they now do, every year for whisky and beer. I think it would be much better to hav an optional high license and allow every man and woman over twenty-one years of age a chance to vote whether they would hav a saloon in their town or not. Mr. Lewis speaks of a new party in Kansas. Does he mean the Prohibition party? I will state for his benefit that the vote polled in this place last election was over three hundred and there was barely one Prohibition vote cast, and this is a first-class orthodox town, I am sorry to say, with two churches running in full blast the year round. I will ask if Mr. Wm. B. Lewis is a subscriber to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. The reason I ask the question is, his article looks very suspicious to a Kansasite, and sounds more like a good Methodist than a Liberal. Yours for truth, A. H. BONSTEEL.

SAN QUENTIN, CAL., Feb. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of Brother Wood I hav had the great pleasure of enjoying a feast by reading your most worthy paper. In my opinion the name should be changed to "Truth Speaker," for it contains more solid truth than any paper I know of. It is a pity that we hav not more of the same kind in this great country. But rest assured of one thing, and that is this, the copy which finds its way every week to this hotbed of crime is like a ray of sunshine to many of the benighted, priest-enslaved minds who caught their first gleam of reason's pure light by hearing words of truth read by either Brother Wood or myself from the columns of your free and brave little paper.

In the hopes that I may awaken some sleeping mind through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER by a few ideas plainly expressed, permit me to state, I am an Infidel not by reason of having read Infidel works, such as Paine's "Age of Reason," Voltaire's works, or, in fact, any work on Infidelity, but I became an Infidel by studying the Bible. And, as previously stated, I hope I may awaken some poor benighted mind by a few remarks and quotations from this greatest of impositions. I expect to be damned by many of the so-called Christian fraternity when I say, all gods, all religions, all Bibles, are but the creations of man, and are the tools by and through which priests and preachers hold their subjects willing and voluntary slaves. Religion does not appeal to reason, common sense, or the laws of nature, but it does appeal to man's superstition—his weakest part, the twin sister of ignorance. Once dispel man's superstition, and that moment religion wraps her dark robes around her and beats a silent, reluctant retreat. If men and women would sit down and study the Bible as they would any other book, they would soon detect behind its golden promises the cunning hand of the priest. But no, they leave that to the priest or preacher to do for them, and the result is that not one in every twenty thousand has ever read a chapter of the Bible in his life. It is to all such I wish to address my remarks. First, let me say that the whole Christian edifice stands upon the truth or falsity of the first book in the Bible, to wit, the book of Genesis. If it is unauthentic, and consequently unreliable, of what value is the whole book? None whatever, because this book tells us who made the world, and how long a time it required to make it. It tells us how man was created, and what was required of him by his creator. In fact, it purports to giv us the history of the entire creation, and claims this knowledge to be imparted to man by the creator himself. Is this true? Emphatically I answer, no.

Now, reader, let us look into the book itself, and ponder well as we read. It says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." What does this prove? Well, my dear readers, it proves that the author lived in the present tense, and was speaking of an event in the past tense—this, and nothing else. Consequently he knew as little about the beginning of creation as we do, which is more clearly proved by the subsequent verses. He tells us the earth was without form and void. Then how did it exist? and why designate a non-existence as an earth? Again, he tells us, "And darkness was upon the face of the deep." Deep what? Deep air? Ah, no, for in the next line we are told that the spirit of God—not God, but the spirit of God—"moved upon the face of the waters," thus leading the mind of man to infer that boundless space was filled with water, in which the earth was created and submerged. Think of it, ye sages, would a publisher of this age be so unmindful of the reputation of his house as to dare publish such an assertion in the face of the present sciences? Let us look a little further. "And God said, Let there be light, and there was light." (He did not make the light, but commanded it to appear.) And we are also told that "he divided the light from the darkness." How did they get mixed? "And the light he called day, and the darkness he called night, and the evening and the morning were the first day." Now, please remember, the sun has not as yet been created. This great event, or feat in legerdemain, was not performed until the fourth day. Now, the question is, What constituted the first light? from whence came it? and whither did it go? It could not hav been the sun. Do we not know that without the sun there would be darkness? In fact, its absence creates our nights, and without its presence life, whether animal or vegetable, would surely die. Yet this book tells us in chapter i, verses 1 and 2, that the earth brought forth grass, herbs, and trees at word of command. To prove that the whole space was filled with water, we are told in verses 6 and 7 that God made a firmament, or said, "Let there be a firmament" in the midst of the waters. What for? Why, to divide the waters from the waters. "And God made the firmament and divided the waters which were under the firmament from those which were above the firmament," etc.

Just think of it! Does it require a man with a college education to account for such balderdash as this? No; that poor ignorant author thought when he saw the rain falling in torrents that there was as much water above him, held in subjection by the great curtain of blue, as there was around him on the earth. He knew nothing of the law of attraction. He never saw a dog-sun in his life, and if he had he would not hav known what it was. He was totally ignorant of every science now known to man. He imagined the stars to be so many luminous-headed spikes, by which the firmament was held in place. His entire knowledge of astronomy is embraced in five words, "He made the stars also." Think of God's great knowledge! Why, my dear readers, this author could only speak of what he saw, not of what existed, consequently the whale is the only fish spoken of in the whole fish creation (see verse 21). This author tells us that God made everything before he made man; in fact, he came near forgetting man altogether; notwithstanding he is the first historian of the creation (and there are several, as shown by this book), yet he does not even hint at the manner of our making, or even giv us a name, but leaves that to the second author, whose history begins at the fourth verse of the second chapter. Now, please note the difference between these two accounts. This author, No. 2, has a great imagination. He tells us that God made the plants and herbs before they grew, before they were in the earth. Thus he tries to account for vegetation.

And he reverses the order of things by saying, or showing, that he made man before he made the animals. In fact, as shown by verses 19 and 20, when he had made the animals he (God) paraded them before Adam, to see what he would name them. (Why did not God name them?) And this author says, "But for Adam there was found no helpmeet for him." Can it be possible that God expected to find a helpmeet for poor Adam among the animals? Now, friends, this author plainly proves that the world had grown old enough and the people had so far advanced in the knowledge of metals that they knew gold when they saw it, and were good judges of its quality. "It was good," as shown in chapter ii, verses 11 and 12.

This author (No. 2) also shows us that labor was not a part of the curse on man for his disobedience, for we find that Adam was the first gardener. And strange to say, author No. 2 tells us all about how man and woman were made. We are indebted to this author for the rib story.

In his third chapter he tells us why the woman was named Eve—"because she was the mother of all living." Now, this proves that this author also was in the present tense and speaking of the past, else how could she be the mother of all living, when we are told that Adam and Eve were the only people on earth, and it could not hav reference to Adam, who was created first and of whom she was a part?

Time and space will not permit of my referring to all the passages in this book which clearly prove it to be the work of man, and that, too, at a much later date than it claims This author shows that God was ignorant of the acts of his own creation, as shown in Adam and Eve eating the forbidden fruit; and also in the case of the murder of Abel, as he asks Cain, "What hast thou done?" etc. This author tells us of the number of Adam's children, and shows us that people knew the uses of iron and brass, and also of musical instruments, such as organs. My! how those people progressed!—and all acquired during the life of the first-created man. We are told that men did not call on the name of the Lord until after the birth of Enos. Then, friends, follows the third author. In chapter v he seems to be a positiv fellow, and so anxious is he to hav his account received as the only authentic one that he tries to giv the entire genealogy of man, but he gets knocked out in the first round by showing his utter ignorance of the lives of Cain or Abel, but commences his account of Adam's family with the birth of Seth, when Adam was one hundred and thirty years old. This author tells us that God made man male and female, and called their name Adam. He never heard of Mother Eve, but declares that a certain holy man, Enoch, never knew death. Here we see the hand of the priest playing upon the credulity of the people. Author 2 would hav us believe that there was a time when serpents walked on their tails, which must hav been before the curse, and in chapter iii, verse 19, we are told that poor Adam was cursed to eat bread in the sweat of his brow. So we must infer that prior to the curse, although he labored in the garden to till and keep it, he did not sweat a drop.

But to proceed. The entire book of Genesis shows God to be one of the greatest ignoramuses that could be thought of. He knew nothing of the character of the very men whom he designated as just men, as in the case of Noah, who was the second man on earth to curse his fellows, and who was the first to make strong drink and the first one to get drunk. God's judgment of character was about as poor as his own character was cruel and changeable, if we can believe his book. And strange to say, all of his selected servants were of the same class as himself. The character of this man-created God embraced all of the worst passions known to humanity. He loved the smell of blood. His covenants made with man were witnessed and signed in the blood of the innocents. His orders to Moses show him to be more of a fiend than the devil. Why, the devil was a saint compared to him. The devil never ordered the murder of innocent children, or made it a crime punishable with death to be a mother. Why, friends, this man-created fiend actually slew the first-born of Egypt, himself, and passed over the land at night to carry out his hellish work. But, strange to say, his power of discernment was as frail as that of his judgment. As we are told that he ordered the Israelites to smear their doorposts with blood. What for? Why, so he would not make a mistake and kill a babe of his own people. Is there a man of intelligence that believes this story? He had no use for married women; no, nothing but virgins would suit or satisfy his black lust or that of his people. His word was as unreliable as his nature was cruel. He declared that he would destroy man from off the face of the earth, but scarcely had he made this threat when he remembered Noah and his family. Why? Because he was a just man, and all of his generations were perfect. Was this true? If so, how is it that so much sin is still in the world? God, having seen his mistake, confuses the people's tongues at the tower of Babel. Thus do they account, or try to, for the many languages on the earth, thus showing that the flood and Babel story was also written at a late date, possibly at about the time when Moses established his tabernacle.

The church would hav us believe that God is merciful. The entire book proves to the contrary. The church would make us believe that the patriarchs were saints and God-loving people, but the book clearly shows that they were idolators and a barbarous people, having no settled dwelling-place. They took no stock in God, as shown by the remarks of Jacob, "If God will be with me and will keep me in this way that I go, and will giv me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God" (Gen. xxviii, 20, 21). And remember that this chosen servant had robbed his brother Esau of his birthright through the connivance of his mother, and he had just robbed his Uncle Laban not only of his stock but of his idols also. Abraham was no better, for he palmed his wife off as his sister, and received remuneration for his act. And Isaac tried the same scheme, but it did not work, as we find that the same king (Abimelech) could not be fooled the second time. This book shows us that this God was one of the finest accoucheurs that the earth ever saw. In fact, he was an adept at the business, as shown in the cases of Sarah, Leah, Rachael, and others too numerous to mention.

His (God's) ambition knew no bounds. He loved titles. First he is known as God. Then follow, Lord God, Lord God Almighty, That I Am, I am That I Am, Jehovah, Terrible, and other titles too numerous to mention. We are told he always sided with the weak, but the book shows he thought more of the tribe of Judah than all of the others put together, and we find it was in point of numbers the strongest tribe of the twelve. We are told that nothing is impossible with this God, but in Judges i, 19, we are told, "And the Lord was with Judah, and drove out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." This most holy book shows that God was proficient in legerdemain, or sleight-of-hand business, and taught it to Moses. He was very partial to volcanoes as a place to reside in, and nothing pleased him so much as to talk through fire or burning bushes. He preferred as associates the greatest whoremongers (David). They were men after his own heart. And an incestuous beast (Amnon) was certain of pardon. He could order the death of innocent children but spare a harlot and her family simply because she secreted his spies. In fact, he preferred the harlot's house in which to make his covenant concerning the land of Canaan. In fact, there is not a crime known to man which he has not committed. He even stoops to catering to the devil to settle an argument, by putting a few more boils on poor Job.

Now let us look at the other character, that of the devil. We are told by the same book that he at one time aspired to be chief God in heaven. I don't wonder at it. This information we receive not in the first book, Genesis, but in the last one in the Bible, Revelation, and we gain this information from a spiritualist. We are next told that the devil tempted woman and man, God's first work. He next aspires to tempt God's only begotten son (oh, what ambition!), having previous to this (his last act) tempted God himself to further afflict poor Job. Did the devil ever damn a man's soul to hell? No. Is there any account of him ordering the murder of women and children, or promoting a man to priesthood because he had murdered a man and woman, as Phineas did? No. Did the devil tell the woman the truth? Yes, and God so acknowledges it, and admits he was afraid that man might put forth his hand and eat of the tree of life, and liv forever. Is there one word in the whole book that shows the devil to be a comparison to God for cruelty? No, not one. If this is true, why are we taught to fear him? Now look at his physical construction, composed of part animal, as bat's wings, and human hideousness. If the authors gave God a heaven, they must giv the devil a dwelling-place also, so they gave him hell. Please look at the material of which heaven is composed—jasper, in fact, all of the precious stones found on the earth, and its streets paved with gold. Its inhabitants (angels) are beautiful women. (Did you ever see a bearded angel? No.) Do they hav any useful vocation in heaven? No, nothing but playing a harp and singing hosannah. Why is this? Simply because the people of that day—or even of this—would not want to go there if they had to work. How was hell first conceived of? By that poor savage author looking on fire and also through suffering pain.

Now, my dear readers, from whence sprang all of this worse than nonsense? I will tell you. It is the teachings and writings of priesthood, originally derived from a prehistoric race of idolators or fetich-worshipers, who through their incomprehension of what they beheld, and ignorance of the laws of nature, conceived the idea of a God. When they heard the roll of the thunder and saw the flash of the lightning, they imagined a higher power than themselvs. And we still find on earth people who prove this conception to be true—people who never saw a Bible or heard a priest chant of God's mercy and love.

Now let me speak of the impostor Christ. I will giv him the credit of never once directly claiming to be the only son of God. He always left that to others to say for him. In fact, we hav not one word of his writing, not even his autograph. He always called himself the son of man. He, too, obtained control of his subjects through sleight-of-hand performance. In fact, there is a great similitude between his methods and those of Moses. Moses turned water to blood; Christ turned water to wine. Moses gave his people manna; Christ gave his followers bread and fish. Moses cured cases of leprosy; Christ healed the sick and raised the dead. Moses died and no man knows of his sepulcher to this day; Christ ascended up to heaven. So it goes. If we find a main incident in the life of Moses, we find also a similar scene in the life of Christ. Moses's birth was attended with danger; so was Christ's, so much so that his mother and father had to take him to Egypt. Thus we see that one religion copies after its predecessor. And please remember, there hav been several Christs on earth; and what is more strange is the fact that they all claim miraculous conception. As the Old Testament shows an entire ignorance of nature's laws, particularly of astronomy and of mineralogy, so does the New. In the Old we are told that in the hills of Canaan one can dig brass (think of it); in the New, we are told that men were raised from the dead notwithstanding they were decomposing. We find the Bibles of other religions, and find also that they antedate our own in age, and we also find almost the same language in both. Now the question is, Which one borrowed from the other? But what is stranger still is the fact that the pagan Bibles giv God the best character, far kinder and more merciful, not cruel at all. Does this not seem strange? And yet because an Infidel declares the Bible of the Christians to be the work of ancient and modern priests, he is told he is unfit to liv. Does their Bible teach love? No. The Old Testament says, "Leave nothing alive that breatheth;" and Christ says, "I came not to bring peace but a sword," etc. Is this the sentiment of love in either case? They tell us we hav a soul to be saved. Has science ever discovered such an organ? No. And notwithstanding the Christian believes this to be true that he has a soul, he as a rule is more ignorant of his Bible than an Infidel. The Christian tells me that God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten son, etc. Is this true? Do we find this assertion in the Old Testament? No, it is in the New. Is love born of fear? Another thing—Who was Christ's heavenly mother? If he was with God ere the world was made, and is the only begotten son, who was his heavenly mother? Not Mary; she was of the earth. And again, who were the sons of God (not son)? Who made wives of the daughters of men, spoken of in Genesis vi, 2? One would naturally believe, if man's soul was so important an organ, that people would be better and acquaint themselvs with their holy book. When an Infidel tells a Christian that God came down on earth especially to tell a priest how to make hair oil or how to rob a bird's nest, he will not believe it. But it is all there. Well, the world is getting wiser and better every day, not through religion but the eternal laws of science. Science has given us all the blessings we now enjoy. Religion has given us discord, paupers, and bloodshed. Science has made us happy and prosperous on earth. Religion curses us here and damns us hereafter—if there is a future. Science has made true men and women free and happy. Religion has made them false and unhappy, and made them slaves. May the day soon come when every church will be a seminary of learning and every preacher an honest man and a true teacher.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Prisoner Jim.

A desperate, dangerous man,
Sent to prison for life—
He was quick at mutinous plan
And eager to stir up strife.

Sulky, morose, and forbidding,
Cold, repulsiv, and grim,
With always a word most stinging,
Such was prisoner Jim.

A party of visitors went,
In leafy June one day,
To see where the lawless were sent—
The prison old and gray.

Among them was one little girl,
With cheeks all rosy-red,
With the sun-gold caught in the curl
That crowned her lovely head.

The feet of the child grew weary
Climbing the prison stair;
With seeing the prisoners dreary
And walls so bleak and bare.

Near by, as sullen as ever,
Hard at work in his place,
Stood the convict, Jim, with never
A smile upon his face.

"Come, Jim," said the guide, "would you mind
Helping the child upstairs?
She's tired, and is lagging behind,
Wearied of our affairs."

The convict turned, frowning and fierce,
And look of defiance cast,
As if with his eyes he would pierce
The hearts of all that passed.

Two little hands upraised near by,
Softly a voice lisped, "Yes,
If you will, Mister Jim—I—I—
I will—kiss you—I guess!"

Jim glanced at the child, and a moan
Was heard within the place
That grew bright with the light that shone
From one sweet baby face,

Then, tenderly as a father,
Lifting the little maid,
Jim looked as though he'd die rather Than she should be afraid.

He carried the child on his arm—
To him 'twas saintly bliss,
When she turned with innocent charm
And touched his lips with a kiss.

At the top of the stairs she said,
Laughing in joyous glee,
As she patted Jim on the head,
"Now, won't you please kiss me?"

The convict paused, with questioning look
At those who stood apart;
Then, close as the leaves of a book,
He held her to his heart.

With white and trembling lips he kissed
The lace upon her gown;
And from his roughened face was missed
The old-time ugly frown.

"I think, Jim, and I believe it's true,"
Said she, "I seem to see
That somewhere, Jim, 'way off, that you Knew a wee girl like me."

Jim blushed to the roots of his hair,
By that sweet voice beguiled;
While slowly he went down the stair,
Crying just like a child.

None knew very much of the man,
Or whom his friends might be;
For since he was under a ban,
From him all seemed to flee.

But, since that day a joy has lain
Upon the convict grim,
And the prison does not contain
A better man than Jim.

Say, "Jack Robinson."

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: "What a funny thing to say!" I think I hear some of my young friends of the Children's Corner exclaim. Do you know why I ask you to say it? Because you will never strike a blow, or say an angry word, or do any act of hasty temper, if you pause long enough to say this simple phrase. I saw such a terrible thing a few days ago that I could not help but think of the very many bright boys and girls to whom my word of warning might not come amiss in the beginning of the new year, and so, if kind Miss Wixon will let me, I will tell it to you.

Two boys, evidently "partners," were cleaning the snow off a sidewalk near my home during the last snow-storm. They had been at their occupation some time, and the older boy was not in the best of humor. It may be that hunger or cold, or misery in some of its manifold forms, made him so—I do not know. But if he had stopped to say "Jack Robinson" he would not be in the terrible plight he is in now. His "partner" was working too slow for him, and he spoke sharply to him. This the other boy resented; words ran high and, sooner than I can tell it, the older boy, with a face distorted with anger, plunged a large clasp-knife into the eye of his companion, inflicting a terrible wound. The poor fellow sunk to the sidewalk screaming with pain, while the other boy, too frightened to run, was taken in charge by a police officer who, like me, had been an eye-witness of the sad occurrence. The wounded boy was quickly hurried into the hospital ambulance which soon came dashing up, where it was discovered that the sight of his left eye was gone forever. The other wretched actor in the little tragedy was sent to the House of Refuge. It is to be hoped he will learn to keep his temper within bounds, and I also hope some kind friend will teach him the simple, easy plan of saying "Jack Robinson." If he learns that simple but valuable lesson he will never again be guilty of such a terrible act.

One more true story and I will draw my little lay sermon to an end. During the '70s the United States government issued orders that the Modoc tribes of Indians were to be removed to the Klamath reservation. The orders stated that they were to be moved peaceably if possible, but, if necessary, force was to be used. The peaceable way was not successful, and suddenly the soldiers surrounded the Indian camp. A "pow-wow" was held and, after some little talk, pro and con, the Modoc chief advised his people to lay down their arms. They all obeyed him with the exception of one brave.

This brave, it seems, had seen his father murdered by a mob of white men about a score of years before while going to warn some other white people of danger from another tribe of Indians, who were hostil. A lieutenant was told by the officer in charge to disarm the Indian. Instead of obeying orders he told the Modoc, with oaths and insulting epithets, to lay down his arms. This the Indian refused to do unless he was asked properly, adding "that he was no dog." The lieutenant drew his revolver. The Indian was equally quick with his; both pulled trigger at the same instant, and both fell dead. Poor Indian! He deserved a better fate. An Indian war was the result. Before the ill-used Modocs were conquered the government spent probably three millions of dollars, and not less than two hundred lives were lost, exclusiv of Indians.

If that officious lieutenant had only said Jack Robinson, how much misery and causeless bloodshed would hav been avoided! And so, boys and girls, when you feel the flush of anger mounting to your cheek, try my simple little plan.

If a schoolmate is not honorable and plays you a mean trick, don't scold or strike; say Jack Robinson. Is your teacher unjust or partial? Don't say the rude words you feel tempted to; say Jack Robinson. And when you come home from school or shop, if you hav any ugly looks or cross words, don't carry them in to mother. She has troubles and trials enough.

If you don't think you can answer her loving smile and kind words, say Jack Robinson before you cross the threshold, and all your cares and bitter feelings will melt away before you hav turned the knob.

If Miss Wixon will let me, and you want me to, we will hav another talk soon.

Your friend. EDWARDS ROUSSEAU.

MISS S. H. WIXON, Dear Madam: If worthy, giv my suggestion space in the Corner—to me it is the most interesting part of the correspondence, and the children must be entertained. When not so weary, I will write more and add other suggestions to "progressiv good." As I say to others, criticise even to censure if needs be, but forgiv letters and pen.

Please hav the form of affirmation printed in the Corner.

Respectfully yours, J. V. MULKS.

SAMOTH, ILL., Jan. 30, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Ma amie: As I am a subscriber—almost the youngest—to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a reticent reader, I deem it discreet that I should sound the blaring bugle anent bibliology.

Religiously, I am a Freethinker; politically, a Republican.

My vocation is that of a tiller of the soil.

"Plowing is paramount to praying," says Colonel Ingersoll. In my estimation the horny hand that holds the plow is more pious than the sacred palm pointed in prayer. I believe the Bible as an aggregate a barbarous book, a man-made volume of inconsistent, immoral, and preposterous precepts.

And in this communication I propose to substantiate my statements with indisputable facts, instead of faith, miracles, and myths.

It is exceedingly more expedient to love and adore our associates than to love a dead deity (Christ). We can aid them, we cannot aid him. I do not believe in a triune godhead, that mathematical mistake—one is equivalent to three, and three is equivalent to one.

I believe in the gospel of grandeur and goodness. My motto is, "The sweet now and now," and "The good time's coming, boys." Not the "mechanical monotony" of "The Sweet By and By," which excites our laughter. I approve Thoreau's sublime thought, "I liv in the present. I only remember the past, and anticipate the future."

I don't think we are possessed of positiv proof of a future life (Eccles. iii, 5; ix, 5).

The "clamoring creeds" feign to believe that a grain of faith is adequate to remove a mountain.

I believe in facts, which are demonstrated truths.

Faith is evidence of things incomprehensible.

I denounce any doctrin that inculcates such absurdities as this: "Cursed be he that keepeth his sword back from blood." "I come not to bring peace, but a sword."

I find in 2 Sam. xii, that David, "a man after God's own heart," slew Uriah and then abducted and committed a crime with his (Uriah's) wife. I find in Genesis a disgusting account of Lot's depraved deed.

Lack of space precludes my penetrating deeper in those aberrant dogmas.

The Children's Corner has a talented corps of contributors, such as Annie Stockinger, Sadie Magoon, Geo. J. Remsburg, and that sweet warbler of the West, Mary Baird Finch.

Miss Elda S. Billings, I will answer your letter soon.

I hav attained the age of twenty.

CHAS. D. MCBRIDE.

P.S.—I hope you'll accept my humble contribution. I highly appreciated your poem entitled, "When Womanhood Awakes."

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

C. D. McB.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Feb. 9, 1891.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, My Dear Sister: My two young cubs, Hoza and Lores, are very much interested in the Corner, and Heston's pictures. They are growing up to be perfect little heathens. When THE TRUTH SEEKER arrives there is no peace until the Corner is read, and the pictures explained. Some of the pictures are enough to make a turtle laugh.

They think I can answer any question. but there they are greatly mistaken. They book me often.

They hav been reading about the discovery of America by Columbus, and the voyages and discoveries by other early navigators. Now they come at me with these questions, and I am floored:

Who paid the men? What wages did they receive; or were they to share in whatever discoveries were made? The king and queen of Spain furnished and fitted out the snips for Columbus: what remuneration were he and his men to receive if successful; or if unsuccessful, what?

Can you enlighten us three little boys, and all of our cousins?

Very truly yours, L. L. GOODWIN.

[It was with great trouble the expedition was fitted out and started. King Ferdinand had no faith in Columbus or his project. He was against it, and declared there was no money in the treasury. Queen Isabella, like many another large-hearted woman, bravely said: "I undertake the enterprise for my own crown of Castile, and will pledge my jewels to raise the necessary funds."

Columbus signed an agreement on his own terms. It contained five articles: 1. That he and his male heirs should hav the office of admiral over all lands he might discover, with honors equal to those of the grand admiral of Castile. 2. He should be viceroy and governor-general, with right to name governors for the king's approval. 3. He should hav one-tenth of the net value of pearls, precious stones, gold, silver, etc., found within lands of his discovery. 4. That he and his lieutenants should be sole judges in all disputes that might arise between his jurisdiction and Spain. 5. He might at any time advance one-eighth in any venture, and receive a corresponding share of the profits. These documents were signed by both the king and queen, but it was Isabella who defrayed all the expenses.

Some of the men accompanying Columbus were paid in advance, how much is not, perhaps, known. Others were impressed, and by this means the full complement was secured. The ship commanded by Columbus had sixty-six men. The other two vessels were of smaller size, with fewer men.—ED. C. C.]

AT the conference of Catholic priests of the archdiocese of New York, last week, there was proposed for their decision the case of an imaginary priest called Albertus, a moderate Socialist, who believed he had a right to attend those meetings in which the property of individuals in land was attacked, and who went to two confessors, the first of whom condemned him for attending the meetings, while the second said he had a right to go to them, but that he should not, for the sake of peace and to avoid giving spiritual offense to weaker brethren. The case to be discussed had been constructed so that it would fit the anti-povertyites. Archbishop Corrigan and Vicar-general Preston, who presided, had two papers, by Father McMahon and Father McGovern, read. Both maintained that Albertus was wrong in contending that the matter of attending the meetings was merely political and beyond the province of ecclesiastical authority. It was an ecclesiastical matter, because it was a question of right and wrong. For ages the church and the world hav recognized the right of individuals to property in land. Although the doctrin which denies such right has never been explicitly denounced, the church has implicitly condemned it by her action. She has accumulated property in land. For these reasons the first confessor was right in condemning the action of Albertus. The course pursued by the second confessor, who told Albertus he had a right to attend the meetings of the moderate Socialists, but ought not to for the sake of avoiding scandal, was condemned by both priests. They held that, as the authorities had decided it was wrong to attend the meetings by making such attendance a reserved case—that is, a case in which only the bishop or some one delegated by him can giv absolution—the priest had no discretion in the matter. All he had to do was simply to act according to the law. Whatever his private opinions might hav been, his public action as a priest should hav been in harmony with the judgment of his superiors. The point was made in the conference that if the second confessor gave absolution to Albertus, that absolution was not valid on account of the reservation that had been put on those who attended the meetings of the moderate Socialists. At a session of the same body a few days after, Archbishop Corrigan thoroughly reviewed the questions brought out by the thesis. He quoted authority from the holy see to prove that the doctrin of the moderate Socialists was against the teachings of the Catholic church. "There was nothing left of Albertus when the archbishop got through with him," was the way a priest who attended the conference put it to a Sun reporter.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Write me if you want to know more about it.

GERMANY will allow members of the Free Religious Society to hold burial services without obtaining permission of the local clergyman.

THE Farmers' Alliance in forming its third party will not ally the Nationalist or Commonwealth party, or the Socialist, as they are too Radical.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S body was conveyed to its burial-place at St. Louis with impressiv military demonstrations in the cities and towns through which it passed.

SIXTEEN workmen's clubs or associations, some Catholic, others without any religious profession, hav joined together in Ghent, Belgium, to form a "Workmen's Anti-Socialist League."

GLADSTONE is heading a movement to disestablish the Church of England in Wales, for the reason, he says, that abolition of the exclusiv privileges of that church will develop the religious life of the country.

PETER HELGREN, of Minneapolis, three weeks ago shot Miss Christian Peterson because she rejected his love. On the 18th a detectiv discovered him near Kingston holding a revival meeting in the family of Jens Oleson.

FROM the uproar in Canada over the coming elections, one might believe that the provinces are on the verge of civil war. The ultra-loyalists, in inflammatory language, accuse the Liberals of treason, charge them with getting up conspiracies, denounce them as enemies of her majesty's government, allege that they are bribed with American greenbacks, and threaten to make wholesale arrests of the annexationists.

SECRETARY GIBSON of the whisky trust has been indicted for offering a detectiv in disguise $25 000 to blow up a distillery at Chicago that refused to enter the trust. The proof seems complete, as the dynamite was handed to the detectiv and is produced, and incriminating letters to him are exhibited. The 150 operatives in the distillery were to be blown up with it, and even the agent was to perish by an unexpected explosion and thus the crime be hid and the $25,000 saved to the fiend.

Gems of Thought.

FOR centuries a scepter combining the form of a cross and a bludgeon was the significant emblem of tyranny. With the aid, nay, in the name, of the Christian hierarchy, the despots of the Middle Ages elaborated a system of subordination of personal freedom to autocratic caprices, which, by comparison, makes the tyranny of the Cæsars a model of liberalism. Every important function of social and domestic life was subjected to the control of arbitrary functionaries, armed with irresponsible power or with a system of oppressiv penal by-laws. Censors suppressed every symptoms of visible or audible protest. Every school was a prison, every judgment-seat a star-chamber. Peasants and mechanics had no voice in the councils of their rulers. The merit of official employees was measured by the degree of their flunkevism.—Prof. Felix Oswald.

NOT in the Bible, but in the Koran, do I find a sentence that best enunciates the great need of the hour—reform in civil service of the republics. It reads, "A ruler who appoints a man to office when there is in his dominions another man better qualified for the position, sins against God and against the state."—Chadwick.

THE world, after all our science and sciences, is still a miracle (i. e., a thing to be wondered at); wonderful, inscrutable, magical, and more, to whomsoever will think of it.—Carlyle.

I DOTE on myself, there is that lot of me and all so luscious,
Each moment and whatever happens thrills me with joy,
I cannot tell how my ankles bend, nor whence the cause of my faintest wish,
Nor the cause of the friendship I emit, nor the cause of the friendship I take again.
That I walk up my stoop, I pause to consider if it really be,
A morning-glory at my window satisfies me more than the metaphysics of books.
—Walt Whitman.

ASCRIBING the cause of things to secret proprieties hath arrested and laid asleep all true inquiry.—Bacon.

MEN will only truly think for themselvs when they learn that the evidences of "God's truth" are all around them, not in musty manuscripts, copied, altered, erased, defaced, and "restored," but in the glorious book of nature, which admits of no forgery, no erasure, no lie.—Robert C. Adams.

THE miraculous has nothing to do with the moral.—Ingersoll.

THE fountain-head of all good actions is not to be sought in the belief in God or in immortality or in whatever is connected with them, but in the conviction that it is the duty of the individual to act in the manner which is recognized as good and useful by society.—Buchner.

CANCER and Tumors CURED: no knife: book free. DRS. GRATIGNY & DIX, No. 163 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

To the World's Columbian Exposition Commission:

Learning that there is an organized movement among the more conservative church people—manipulated by a "Sabbath" organization—to induce your honorable body to close on Sundays the World's Fair, to be held in 1893 in Chicago, the undersigned respectfully put in this counter petition, and ask that the Fair may be open to the public on each Sunday of its continuance. We ask this for the following reasons:

1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

3. As a matter of justice also to the people of Chicago who have given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

4. For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and, therefore, the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposite. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

WHAT UNCLE SAM WILL YET BE FORCED TO DO.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Central Presbyterian says: "The truth is, that there seems to be a craze in certain quarters for human machinery within the church. There seems to be a want of confidence in the efficacy of the agencies and means which our Lord has instituted. It is a subtle form of unbelief creeping into the church."

HERE is a comical rebuke bestowed upon a lawless youth by a Georgia judge: "Young man, you were blessed with a noble and exemplary father, who inculcated in your young mind the principles of honesty and virtue, and a pious mother who nightly offered up prayers for you; instead of which you go around stealing ducks!"

NEW YORK city rejoices in a "Lambs' Club." Col. Robert Ingersoll is an ardent Lamb. A young man asked him the other day if he thought it a sin to gamble. "A sin!" exclaimed the genial colonel. "No, sir, a blessing. Come and see us gambol at the Broadway Theater next Tuesday afternoon. I'll giv you my views then."

A ROMAN Catholic priest writes that "at this time of the year many of the sick experience an increase of sadness and loneliness, and to do something to lessen the trials of these dear ones is a pleasant duty of Christian charity." The application proposed by the priest consists in "sending to the sufferers a little water from the grotto at Lourdes."

THE Indians feel very cross over the way their messiah acted and hav now lost all faith in their strange belief, because the messiah did not render them assistance in their hour of need. The ghost shirt is now regarded by them as nothing better than an ordinary piece of cloth or sheet. Their fanatical belief in the power of the shirts to protect them from all harm has almost entirely disappeared, for the present, at least.

"A MEMORIAL has been sent to Congress," said a lady, "asking that body to make provision for submitting the question of female suffrage to the vote of the American people. I am opposed to it for the reason that only men are to do the voting, and I hold that women also should be allowed to vote on it. It is a question on which we ought to hav the opinion of everybody, without regard to sex."

THE following amusing lie is cabled from Hamburg, Germany: "A very tragic incident occurred in the court February 22 l. Two Socialists, Sigismund and Berenson, were ordered to appear before the magistrate to answer charges of blasphemy preferred by the public prosecutor. Although suffering from acute influenza, they obeyed the summons, and while listening to the evidence against them they both suddenly expired."

AT the Anti-Poverty meeting last Sunday Dr. McGlynn said: "I was excommunicated for preaching doctrins into which, a cardinal told me, the Catholic authorities had never even examined. I would see them all burning, and myself on top of the heap, before I would retract one word of what I said. Has the pope so identified himself with God that he is beyond the pale of criticism? Must we wait until he is dead before we can criticise him?"

THE Rev. Mr. Milligan, who is a candidate for the pastorate of the Covenanter church in Coldenham, Pa., and who was invited to deliver a trial sermon there on the 22 l ult., startled the congregation in the midst of the delivery of the sermon by saying: "I regret to state that I am an exceedingly nervous man, and am annoyed by a young lady in the congregation who has been endeavoring to flirt with me this morning. I hav neither the time nor inclination to return the compliment at this time, but may do so later."

MR. CAHILL has introduced into the assembly a "bill providing that cigarets shall be examined by the board of health." While Mr. Cahill is about it, exclaims the Sun, why doesn't he bring in a "bill prohibiting all persons from smoking cigarets, pipes, cigars, rattan, sweet fern, or dried pond lily stems without a license from the board of health?" If the annual bill-fall continues to increase at the present alarming rate, by 1925 no citizen will be allowed to breathe unless his lungs hav been tested by a national board of pneumometry.

A REMARKABLE scene, and one that struck part of the audience as very amusing, occurred in the Michigan Democratic state convention on the 26 h ult. After the preliminaries were gone through with Rev. Mr. E. R. Clark, a local preacher, was called upon for prayer, and in his prayer he made a stump speech. The delegates were wrought up to a high pitch, and when he asked the deity "to guide the footsteps of the convention in the track of that grand old Democrat, Thomas Jefferson," the convention broke into applause.

A FRANKLIN, Pa., dispatch says: "Menard Hutchinson, living five miles southwest of West Middlesex, recently joined a Farmers' Alliance club, understanding that it was not a secret society and therefore would not come under the ban of the United Presbyterian church of which he was a member. After being initiated he found reason to change his mind. He determined to go before the elders and confess that he had unwittingly sinned against the ordinances of the church. Forgivness was extended to him provided he would leave the Alliance, which he did promptly."

AT DES Moines, Ia., the coroner's jury in the case of William Protzman on the 21st ult. rendered a verdict declaring that he came to his death "by reason of practicing the teachings of an association of persons calling themselves Christian Scientists." Protzman was taken ill about the middle of December with typhoid pneumonia. He and his wife were believers in the doctrin of Christian Science, and Mrs. Garren, a teacher of that belief, was summoned to treat the patient, who grew rapidly worse. As his condition became more serious, additional "doctors" of the same belief were summoned. All established laws for the treatment of the sick were disregarded. The patient was deprived of watchers at night, although assistance was frequently offered by relatives and friends. Most of the time he was delirious, and when the neighbors finally threatened to call the attention of the authorities to the manner of his treatment the sick man was placed in a hack and moved to another building half a mile distant. The grand jury will investigate the case.

Religion and Morals.

All the religious beliefs that exist, or hav ever existed, in the world, hav sprung from a craving for knowledge of the unknown. Confined within the boundaries of scientific investigation this craving has resulted in the discovery of all we know of the knowable. Extended into the realms of imagination and superstition it has caused men to accept fancied revelations of the unknowable. The subtle, the crafty, and the ambitious, uniting for the purpose of drawing their subsistence from the weak and ignorant, formed the various bodies of priesthoods, through which such revelations hav been supposed to come, and which hav ever preyed, and still prey, upon the vitals of a suffering human race. The untutored democracy were thus brought into subjection to an ecclesiastical aristocracy. The next step was to subdue the lay leaders of the people, or purchase their adherence. Priests and medicin men would not willingly permit the civil power to exercise an independent authority liable at any time to act in opposition to theirs. The temporal ruler must be taught that the preservation of his right to rule could be best secured by alliance with ecclesiastical law. Thus au unholy league was formed for the maintenance of oppression. Man was chained body and soul. The doctrin of the divine right of kings to govern was the bulwark of the throne. The sword of the tyrant was the guardian of the altar.

To be good and faithful subjects of the church and of the empire, men must be trained and disciplined in obedience. They must not act according to their own judgments of right and wrong. The laws of church and state must direct their actions. That natural code of morals which every man who has brains enough to know right from wrong can construct for himself must be ignored, or worse, condemned as tainted and corrupt through original depravity. Instead of acting with reference to results upon the being affected by the action, men must conform their lives to artificial standards set up by designing, often wicked, teachers. Not to do good because it produces good, but to do the arbitrary will of an unknown god, expressed through priest or magistrate, must constitute the moral life. The human beings must be clay in the hands of the potter. The potter was the god the fears of fools created. His right hand was the church, and his left hand was the state.

Thus we find that the morals of mankind hav become rotten to the core, because the rottenness of religion has been blended with them and has infected them from the beginning. We meet with one who has no scruples in robbing the widow and the orphan, yet would tremble to eat meat upon a Friday. We find another who will cheat, lie, and thieve six days in the week, but will not do a stroke of honest work upon a Sunday. And yet every day we hear it said by people who admit that all religions are false, that they are necessary to preserve morality among men. Such morals as religions giv us, no doubt religions are necessary to preserve. But the morals are as false as the religions from which they spring. We cannot found a code of ethics upon a system of lies and expect it to be true and good. And so we may all make use of a new litany and say, "From the laws of churches and of priests, from the commands of kings and governors, from the false teachings of hypocrits and fools, from the ignorance of religious schools, from the caprices of gods, O man, deliver us. That we may be taught to know right from wrong, that we may acquire the power to refuse the evil and to choose the good, O man, hear us. That we may together strive to benefit each other and ourselvs, that we may win in the fight with tyrants who hav enslaved us, that we may drive out the will of God and plant upon the walls of the temple of human right our own purified and ennobled free will, O man, help us."

We found a system of morality upon theological doctrins which will not stand one breath of reason. We hav no right to complain if such structures fall. We hav no cause to regret their fall. Let them go. In their places build a new structure in which each man can move and breathe and exercise his individual liberty in perfect harmony with the liberties of his fellows. Let us raise higher and higher our own human will till it shall tower above, overshadow, crush, and utterly extinguish the will of God. There is no man or woman on earth so low and vile as not to be worth more than a million times all the gods that ever brought desolation upon the world. For in man and woman, however depraved, we may still find some capacity for good, while gods hav shown us nothing but their power to keep us in subjection to evil.

But the climax of absurdity is reached when our honest Christian neighbor in whom nativ human goodness is so strong that, in spite of his creed, in spite even of the Bible he reads, he is still a respectable and decent member of the community, tells us that but for that creed and Bible he would perpetrate outrageous crimes. Why, my good friend, what possible motiv could you hav to burn your neighbor's house, or cut his throat, or rob his family, then, that you hav not now? Does crime pay? Is the condition of the criminal superior to that of the good citizen? The criminal, whether he believes in God and Bible or not, is a criminal because it is his nature to be so, because circumstances hav developed the evil that is in him, and, perhaps, because churches hav taught him the lie that sinners can sin and yet escape the consequences of their sins. The murderer will not stay his hand from striking the fatal blow because he has read that Moses slew a man and escaped punishment for the deed. The thief will not steal one horse the less because he believes that Jesus stole two donkeys, and rode in triumph into Jerusalem on both of them. The evil doer will not turn from his evil ways because he is told that all his bad deeds were atoned for long ago by the immolation of a god-man upon a cross. And yet men tell us that Bibles and churches alone prevent them from joining the ranks of criminals. If I did not know that their religion, which tells them that God sent a lying spirit among his prophets to deceive his people, led them to lie even against themselvs, I would not trust myself unarmed in the presence of some Christian believers.

My Christian friend, maybe you do not cut your neighbor's throat because you hav a natural aversion to being hanged or electrocuted. Or you may hav no inclination to such butchery, or no motiv for such a deed. But if I knew that Christianity and the Bible were all that stood bet ween my throat and a knife in your hand, I would try to shoot you down before you came within cutting distance.

I would rather trust to the possible risk of two weeks in the workhouse as a preventiv of crime than to all the hell-fire and brimstone the orthodox ever imagined. One policeman is a better guardian of the peace than all the horned and long-tailed fiends that ever visited Dunstan, and the more fascinating devils that tormented Anthony. And still more, one grain of common-sense morality free from religious adulteration is a better purifier of the world from vice than all the jails, policemen, priests, and churches on earth combined.

To save the world from moral error and deformity, to train men to lead virtuous lives, is a glorious task. Under the false pretense of accomplishing this task, Christianity begs our support. It would hav us aid it by our money and our presence in its churches. It deludes us into exempting its property from taxa'ion and feeding and clothing its expounders for no value received. It givs people a book containing some gems of truth buried in such a muck-heap of ridiculous absurdities that it takes a man who has nothing else to do a lifetime to pick them out. It gathers, once a week or so, a few real or pretended believers together, and urges them to tell a being who is supposed to know all their thoughts, what they want him to do, and preaches to them doctrins which they hav already learned and previously accepted. And then it forms for them a system of morality to agree with those doctrins. The morality, like all the rest of its work, has in it as much of truth and goodness as it derives from human nature. All the rest is false and bad because it is the outcome of a false revelation. But common sense will sometimes operate in the mind of every man, woman, and child who is not a hopeless lunatic. It strikes at the theological foundation on which this morality is built, often smashes it into fragments and the whole structure falls. Then the pious fools exclaim, "See the result of skepticism and Infidelity. The loss of faith leads to the loss of virtue." And well it might be so when even the natural virtues of these church-trained dupes hav been dragged from that humanity to which they belonged and imbedded in the sand of a theological system which the breath of reason could at any time scatter, and the tide of an advancing knowledge must eventually sweep entirely away. I would not giv two straws for a virtue which knows no better foundation than dread of hell or fear of God. There are too many mercies at the eleventh hour, too many loopholes to escape damnation. And if there were not, the man who leads a good life only because he fears to liv a bad one, is altogether too mean a being, too prone to crime in his heart of hearts, to be trusted in a civilized community anyway.

We exempt our churches from taxation, and their members, or those who hav been led astray by their teachings, fill our prisons which we are taxed to support. If we would teach our people to be moral, we must first discover in what true morality consists. We must separate it from the rubbish blended with it through ages of priestcraft. We must learn that those actions are moral which contribute to the general good, those immoral which are injurious to the community. For the first and greatest commandment of the human moral law is this: Thou shalt do as thine own judgment teaches thee is good without regard to God and devil; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt suffer every man and woman to do as he or she thinks fit to do, provided only that they interfere not with thine own or others' rights.

E. J. Bowtell.

The Religion of Charles Bradlaugh.

Much has been written of late of Mr. Bradlaugh as a man, a politician, and a social reformer; but very few writers hav had the courage to view him, as I propose to do in this article, in the light of a religious reformer.

And yet, considered from this point of view, subsequent ages will probably regard Mr. Bradlaugh as one of the mightiest workers for religious reform the world has ever seen.

It will naturally be asked, What do I mean by religion?

The late Matthew Arnold once defined it as "morality touched by emotion," and this definition, which is large and comprehensiv, comprises what the wisest and best among men now regard religion in its essence to be.

Mr. Bradlaugh, I am aware, never used the word religion in this sense; in my judgment he was often too prone to accept the definitions of the more narrow-minded among his opponents.

He was, however, one of the ablest exponents of the philosophy of Secularism, which the most eminent philosopher of this century, John Stuart Mill, said might well be regarded as "the religion of this world," without regard to the question of another.

And now let me clear away some of the misconceptions of the ordinary public respecting the views of Mr. Bradlaugh on the greatest problems that can engage human thought.

Many perfectly honest people imagin that Mr. Bradlaugh was in the habit of launching forth emphatic denials of the existence of God, but in this, as in most of the views they formed of this great man, unless they took the trouble to go and hear him, they were egregiously mistaken.

Speaking with a personal knowledge of Mr. Bradlaugh of over sixteen years, I can conscientiously affirm that he was most cautious and guarded in his language on every subject, on theological no less than on social or political questions.

What then did he say in reference to the question of the existence of God?

Here are his exact words: "The Atheist does not say there is no God, but he says, 'I know not what you mean by God; I am without idea of God; the word "God" is to me a sound conveying no clear or distinct affirmation. I do not deny God, because I cannot deny that of which I hav no conception, and the conception of which by its affirmer is so imperfect that he is unable to define it to me'" (Plea for Atheism, p. 3).

How different this to the cross and brutal language which many people imagin Mr. Bradlaugh was wont to use in dealing with such a subject!

Having no idea of God, Mr. Bradlaugh naturally turned his attention to subjects the issue of which could be decided in this world.

True, he criticised the Bible; but in doing so he never relied exclusivly upon his own critical powers, but always supported his contentions by quotations from such great authorities as Spinoza, Kalisch, Colenso, and others. It must be remembered also that after Mr. Bradlaugh had been criticising the Bible for some years it underwent a revision, and alterations were made which showed that the work of the eminent critics above named had not been in vain.

It is worthy of notice also that many of the leading lights in the church hav since modified their view of the Bible, as the issue of such a notable book as "Lex Mundi" from Oxford demonstrates beyond a doubt.

Mr. Bradlaugh never attempted to destroy the truths of the Bible—he merely pointed out some of its errors, many of which hav now been acknowledged by the leading scholars in the church. In time to come, therefore, I verily believe that Mr. Bradlaugh will be regarded by Christians in the light of a great religious reformer.

Turning, however, from what Mr. Bradlaugh did not believe to what he did believe, let me say at once that he affirmed his belief in the infinity and eternity of existence—in other words, that an unending chain of causes and effects comprised existence.

He believed also in the invariability of nature's laws; and this naturally led him to disbelieve in all miracles, Christian and pagan alike.

He believed that all the good in the world was to be brought about by human effort—by the employment of material means.

Instead of hoping that things might get better, he worked to make them better. No task, however formidable, frightened him. The word failure he expunged very early from his vocabulary.

He saw at a glance what was wanted, and worked with indomitable will and courage to accomplish it. He assailed injustice on every hand. When quite a youth in the army, an arrogant landlord stuck up a post forbidding persons to walk across a certain pathway; young Bradlaugh looked up the law on the subject, pulled down the post, and stuck up in its place the announcement that the said prohibition was removed by Charles Bradlaugh, of the Seventh dragoon guards, then stationed in Ireland.

This was characteristic of his whole life. He was always pulling down some impediment in the path of progress.

Many of the obstacles to progress that he sought to remove were intellectual. I refer now to those which most people regard as religious, but which Mr. Bradlaugh viewed in the light of superstitions.

And how tenaciously some people cling on to their superstitions, even when they feel that they are no longer defensible, only those who make it their duty to assail error wherever they find it can properly understand.

The religion of Mr. Bradlaugh may be summed up in the language of Thomas Paine: "All the world is my country, and to do good my religion."

Mr. Bradlaugh did not believe in creeds, but in deeds.

Let me record a few of the good things he did in his day.

In the first place, he fought the battle of the freedom of the press, and printed his paper, the National Reformer, "in defiance of her majesty's government."

In this battle he had against him such eminent counsel as Sir Robert Collier, Sir J. D. Coleridge (now lord chief-justice), and Mr. Crompton Hutton; and yet he was successful in the fight. After this great victory John Stuart Mill wrote to him and said: "You hav gained a very honorable success in obtaining a repeal of the mischievous act by your persevering resistance." Mr. Bradlaugh saw that without freedom of the press and freedom of speech we could get no progress.

He therefore fought for the right of public meeting in Hyde park and other public places, and stood by the people in the face of great danger.

On more than one occasion I hav seen him when he has been assailed, and I know not only the great courage he always displayed, but the extraordinary strength he was capable of exerting on such occasions.

To show the power he had over the people take the following case.

I was present at the Victoria Music Hall when Mr. Chamberlain, then the beau ideal of a Radical, was delivering an address. The hall was crowded to suffocation and thousands were unable to gain admission—indeed, so great was the throng outside that Mr. John Morley (the chairman) and Mr. Chamberlain found great difficulty in getting in themselvs. Among the members of Parliament on the platform was Mr. Bradlaugh. The meeting went on smoothly enough during the address of Mr. Morley, but when Mr. Chamberlain rose to speak the people outside forced the doors open and came in with a rush. At this moment a glass door came down with a crash, and almost caused a panic. The chairman appealed for order, but the rush from outside was so great that many lives must hav been lost had not Mr. Bradlaugh at this juncture gone outside and addressed the meeting, and by his presence drawn off the crowd who were struggling to get inside.

On the following day, on my own behalf and that of a few friends who sat near me, I wrote to Mr. Bradlaugh, thanking him for his conduct in going outside to address the meeting, and thus, no doubt, saving many from being fearfully injured or even from an untimely death.

Mr. Bradlaugh was always the friend of the oppressed. When Joseph Mazzini, the Italian patriot, was an exile from his nativ land, he found in this country no greater friend than the late member for Northampton.

All the world knows now what Mr. Bradlaugh did for the people when he had duly taken his seat in the house of Commons after being unjustly and illegally excluded for some years. He caused a large number of perpetual pensions to be commuted; he passed his famous bill for making it legal for unbelievers to giv evidence upon simple affirmation; improved the truck act; and was preparing to secure an act of justice to our brethren in India by gaining for them a fair system of representation, when unhappily his valuable life was suddenly brought to a close.

His religion then was expressed in his actions; and surely none will deny that the accumulated actions of a life such as his constitute a good record. Morality, to him, was to be judged by the utility of one's actions. All actions that promoted the well-being of humanity were good, while actions which had the opposit tendency he regarded as immoral.

It is quite true that he did not believe in a future life; he was not satisfied with the evidence in favor of the immortality of the soul. But surely if good conduct merits future happiness in some other world, he will deserve it. He has gone to his grave loved by the people, and praised by many who were once his greatest enemies. Let us reverently repeat over his grave the words he once uttered over the grave of an old colleague:

> He did well, he did his best;
> No more weary, now at rest.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

P.S.—This article was originally written for a London weekly, but was rejected on the ground that it might offend some of its readers.—A. B. M

Letters to Workingmen.

I hav dwelt upon the fact that man began wrong—began in absolute ignorance, devoid of language or intelligence, or at least confined to a few words and the merest rudiment of knowledge. This, and this only, distinguished him from the brute. I want to impress upon you this fact. I believe it is of the utmost importance in solving all questions of right conduct. We must return to first principles. Instinct is inherited memories and early impression with unconscious application, a survival of the fittest modes looking to the perpetuation of the species, a purely natural selection. All modes of existence become fixed in habits, even as inherited memories become fixed in instinct. Reason is a conscious application and introduces a new factor in evolution. We begin to think and to apply ways to means and conscious selection begins, but still the instincts and habits of the animal are strong within us. And this is why the strong were tyrants and the weak were slaves. And this is why we still are such "base, ignoble slaves." We hav voluntarily assumed the chains of superstition, and although a large majority we are still the slaves of a few. The debasing influence in this connection has been the idea of obedience to authority impressed upon the growing mind as a duty. "Children, obey your parents." That parents could be wrong was something the young mind should never contemplate. Servants, obey your master; his authority is just. Citizens, obey your sovereign. "The king can do no wrong." And over all the unquestioned authority of a God. The cry is still, Obedience, children, wives, citizens, and slaves.

> Obedience,
> Bane of all genius, virtue, freedom, truth,
> Makes slaves of men, and of the human frame
> A mechanized automaton.

In other words, we are moved by an instinct of obedience to authority inherited from a savage ancestry. The old slavish fear is in our organization, an echo of the time when might made right, when disobedience was a sin and disrespect of authority the highest of crimes. Think it over, friends. Why should one man assume the power to guide, control, and direct another, each the equal child of nature? Is it not simply because he is stronger and in his own conceit wiser? The parent domineers his child because he can. It is the old brutish instinct in our nature. The presumptuous claim the right of possession. The child, the wife, the slave, is mine or thine. The right of possession givs the right of authority. Deny the right of possession or property in the wife, the child, the slave, and we hav no basis in nature for authority. We predicate, "All men are born free and equal," but it is in theory only. Practically they are slaves and equal only with others in like condition. From the cradle to the grave we run the gauntlet of authority, parental, school, theological, and political.

> The man
> Of virtuous soul commands not, nor obeys.
> Power, like a desolating pestilence,
> Pollutes whate'er it touches.

I hav said, obedience to authority was impressed upon the growing mind as a duty. And I said before, I do not like the word duty. Like Cleopatra's "but yet," "it doth allay the good procedure." Justice I love and mercy I admire, but duty I detest and charity I abhor. The man "in duty bound" may well believe that life is not worth living. "Let us render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." I believe in reciprocity. But duty is an obligation without an equivalent. When once a debt is paid, even in interest, it is, or should be, canceled; but duty is a debt drawing interest forever. We owe our existence to God, saith the preacher, hence we are in duty bound to follow his mandates, as prescribed by his agents and written in his book. We owe our life, liberty, and possessions to government, cries the politician. Hence our duty is to honor and obey our rulers, perpetuate and support political government. Duty to his country makes a man throw away his life upon the battle-field, making his loved ones orphans and his wife a widow. Duty to government makes a man a slave to party politics, corrupting his youth and debauching his manhood. It was duty to his God that made John Calvin burn Servetus at the stake.

> I pity the dumb victims at the altar,
> But does the rob'd priest for his pity falter?

No. God's outraged majesty must be vindicated. It is duty to the law that bids the judge condemn the man to the gallows who in a moment of passion kills his neighbor. Duty to God, to government, and the law has gibbeted, guillotined, and burnt its thousands. Madam Roland should hav said, "O duty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" The majesty of law demanded victims, when several uniformed slaves met their death in dispersing a public meeting in Chicago. Somebody threw a bomb, and four men, innocent of any crime against any individual, must die the death and three others wear out their lives behind prison bars. They had said that lawyers and priests were useless drones, consuming the honey of the working bees, and that the workers should destroy this system of robbery. They had said the laws were of the rich, by the rich, and for the rich, and they claimed that government had become subversiv to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and in the words of the Declaration of Independence, "whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it." They had said that wealth and cunning, by the aid of superstition, had enslaved labor; that government was manipulated by these to make this robbery respectable. They had said the law must be strangled, and the government abolished. They proclaimed the right of revolution, and prophesied the coming of the storm. Like John crying in the wilderness, they lifted up their voice in behalf of downtrodden labor. "Prepare ye! prepare ye!" It was duty that led them forth like lambs to the slaughter, and duty to the government and the majesty of law swung them from the gibbet. That government should seek to destroy its enemies is not to be wondered at. But that we, the laboring poor, should join the rabble and cry, "Crucify them! Crucify them!" would be strange indeed, did we not know that duty bids us act, duty to our party, duty to our government. duty to our God, anything but duty to ourselvs. A Western editor, feeling the call of duty, prints what was repugnant to his own feelings, being satisfied it was needful to the reform he advocated. At the command of duty he placed his head in the mouth of the lion of the law, and duty to society and its respectability urged the "lion" to sacrifice the editor. I know it is claimed that the "blood of the martyr" is necessary, or at least a great help, to all reform. But it seems to me I had rather hav one quiet but persistent gentleman or lady whose actions are prompted by feelings of pleasure than a dozen dead or imprisoned martyrs to duty. Professor Sumner says, "Every man or woman in society has one big duty—that is to take care of his or her self."

This is a social duty, fortunately for the matter, so that the duty of making the best of oneself individually is not a separate thing from the duty of filling one's place in society. But the trouble begins with "the common notion . . . that one has a duty to society as a special thing, and that this duty consists in considering and deciding what other people ought to do." It is always the other fellow we are concerned about; to see that he is properly instructed, controled, and protected, constitutes our one great duty. Yet man is essentially selfish. He is all the time scheming to better his condition, at the same time trying to make it appear he is disinterested, if not an actual philanthropist. Well, what would you? Do you not advocate selfishness? Yes; but not hypocrisy. Let us acknowledge the corn. The protection we would throw around so generously, and the charity we would display so ostentatiously, are really prompted by egotistical motivs. To hav protectors we must hav masters; to hav masters we must hav slaves; to be charitable we must hav victims of injustice. What the world needs is equal opportunity. Withdraw all class advantage and let the best man win; withdraw the advantage and protection guaranteed to capital and the labor question would be settled; withdraw the protection granted the landlord and the land question would be no more. And so with every question that perplexes society, at the bottom is the injustice of class legislation, sanctioned by ancient custom and hallowed by a sense of duty.

Years of the Modern.

Selected from Walt Whitman.

Years of the modern! years of the unperform'd!
Your horizon rises, I see it parting away for more august dramas,
I see not America only, not only Liberty's nation but other nations preparing,
I see tremendous entrances and exits, new combinations, the solidarity of races,
I see that force advancing with irresistible power on the world's stage, (Hav the old forces, the old wars, played their parts?
are the acts suitable to them closed?) . . .

Never were such sharp questions ask'd as this day,
Never was average man, his soul, more energetic,
more like a God. . . .

The earth, restiv, confronts a new era, perhaps a general divine war,
No one knows what will happen next, such portents fill the days and nights;
Years prophetical! the space ahead as I walk, as I vainly try to pierce it, is full of phantoms, Unborn deeds, things soon to be, project their shapes around me,
This incredible rush and heat, this strange ecstatic fever of dreams O years!
Your dreams O years, how they penetrate through me! (I know not whether I sleep or wake;)
The perform'd America and Europe grow dim, retiring in shadow behind me,
The unperform'd, more gigantic than ever, advance, advance upon me.

The American Secular Union—Personal.

Within the last few weeks I hav been inundated with letters from the various parts of the United States, asking my opinion upon the present condition of the American Secular Union. It is to be regretted that any misunderstanding should hav arisen among members of what could be made a most useful organization. In my opinion the present officers, having been elected, should be properly supported, at least for one year, and then, if it is found that they hav forfeited the confidence of those who elected them, they should not again be placed in power. I find it is generally conceded that the present board is the best that the Union has had for many years; therefore, it is only just that its members should hav a fair opportunity to carry out their program without unnecessary and reprehensible efforts being made to thwart their every movement. I write thus the more freely because I do not quite agree with Dr. Westbrook upon many points, yet I recognize in that gentleman a noble nature and an honest desire to do what he considers best for the welfare of the Union. Moreover, he has devoted his time and energy to the cause to a greater extent, perhaps, than any previous president has done; and besides, he has the assistance of a most able and accomplished secretary, one who in all probability could not be equaled and certainly could not be excelled. One thing in my opinion is evidently required, and that is an amendment of the constitution. As it now stands, it appears to many persons to be not quite clear whether the Union is a political, Secular, or an anti-theological organization. As to the field secretaryship, my advice is to let that matter stand over until the next congress, and in the mean time let harmony prevail and other practical work be done.

Now, it must be understood that I hav neither the time nor the inclination to take a prominent part in the unpleasant and undignified controversy which has recently been going on in the columns of some of the American Freethought journals upon the subject of this field secretaryship. In fact, the matter would not be referred to at all by me if my name had not been so freely and erroneously used in connection with the question. Judging from the reckless and vehement manner in which two or three writers hav given vent to their evidently pent-up feelings in reference to myself, the ordinary reader may reasonably suppose that the board of directors of the American Secular Union had offered me the office of field secretaryship, and having consented to accept that position I was now a candidate for it. The truth is, nothing of the kind has taken place, and those who hav so indiscreetly concerned themselvs upon the subject hav been victims of their own fancy. It would hav been far better for them to hav learned all the facts of the case before writing such impetuous folly and exhibiting such childish simplicity. The whole affair would be to me extremely amusing, did it not reveal the sad spectacle of petty jealousy and anti-Liberal conduct upon the part of those from whom I certainly expected better things. Would it not hav been wiser to hav caught the hare before indulging in senseless recriminations as to the best mode of cooking it?

For the benefit of the rational observer of this silly conflict, and also for the consolation of the fault-finders themselvs, let me say most distinctly that the board to my knowledge has not sent me an invitation to be field secretary, and therefore I could not hav accepted any such invitation. Moreover, I wish it to be clearly understood that I hav not been in competition with Mr. Charlesworth or anyone else for the office. By the way, this gentleman has placed his "friends" in a most unenviable position by his statement in last week's TRUTH SEEKER Therein he alleges that "Charles Watts was not the man" intended for the lectureship. Now, this is a tremendous "set-back" for those unfortunate victims of a much-to-be-regretted mental affliction, and it should tend to allay the alarm which their vivid imagination had conjured up as to myself.

It appears that five out of the seven members of the board did me the honor (for which I am grateful) of expressing as their opinion that I should be well suited for the field secretaryship, and they made this fact public. Thereupon, without waiting for the offer to be submitted, accepted, or rejected, one or two excitable American-born heroes rush into print protesting with nativ pride against their national rights and emoluments being thus usurped by an Englishman, forgetting, however, in their excitement, that Mr. Charlesworth, the very man they were putting forward for the office, had the misfortune, like myself, to be born upon English soil. Now, considering the origin and composition of the American race, it would be very interesting to know what serious objection there could be to any person, simply on account of his being an Englishman, filling any office in a Secular society.

But what a grave and narrow-minded inconsistency for those persons to introduce the question of nationality who publicly profess to indorse the doctrin of Thomas Paine, when he said, "The world is my country." For Liberals to speak of "jealousies, especially race preferences," as mentioned by Dr. Foote, is to show that Secularism is not by any means the only philosophy a "few American Liberals" do not understand.

With questionable taste and in a method calculated to mislead, it has been alleged that my engagement with the Union about seven years ago, when first I came from England, resulted in a pecuniary loss. Now, in justice to myself, let me emphatically state that I had nothing whatever to do with the business part of that engagement. The secretary traveled with me, made all the lecturing engagements, took all fees, and paid all liabilities, my duty being only to lecture where appointed. This I did on all occasions. The financial failure was not to be wondered at when two persons were appointed to do what one of us could easily hav accomplished, and thus hav saved the salary of one person besides half of the railway and hotel expenses incurred. I kept my engagement and the Union paid me honorably without any dispute. Why should Dr. Foote refer to the matter as he does at the present time? The reason is not difficult to divine. Would the doctor refuse to take his fees for medical services rendered even to an Englishman? I trow not. The mentioning of this circumstance might hav had some force if I applied for another engagement under similar circumstances to those existing on the former occasion. But I do not, and fortunately now there is no necessity for my so doing. It is to be regretted that the fact of an Englishman receiving years ago a few hundred dollars for traveling thousands of miles and lecturing most nights, should still be a sore point with certain Americans. This is protection with a vengeance, and by way of a slight compensation, if the grieved ones will accompany me the next time I go to England they shall be guaranteed full pay for all the engagements they fill and shall never be reproached, although they are Americans, for receiving the reward of their labors. Would this be free trade or reciprocity, which?

I find that sorrow dwells in another quarter. Although, as already stated, I was never a candidate for this much-coveted secretaryship, yet Freethought of February 1st has an article, written almost, one would think, in tears by one of its editors, foreshadowing the ruinous consequences to other lecturers, and also to other Freethought papers, if I accept the office with Secular Thought at my command. The editor says: "Besides invading, full-armed and panoplied, the territory of lecturers, will he [Mr. Watts] also bring his paper at the expense of all subscribers to the Guarantee Fund, into competition with the established Freethought journals now struggling for an existence? . . . Is any portion of his time to be devoted to working for that paper? If yes, will that be fair toward the other journals?" Does this writer forget that when one of the present editors of Freethought was a paid lecturer for the Union, a few years ago, he was at the same period an activ agent for a Liberal journal, and that much of his time was "devoted to working for that paper?" Besides, this agent carried hundreds of dollars' worth of books and sold them at the lectures for the benefit of the firm owning the paper in question. Was that "fair toward the other journals" then "struggling for existence?"

The matter, however, is not worth further serious notice. The letter from Dr. Foote, Jr., to Dr. Westbrook, and the article referred to above, fully explain the whole matter, and indicate without a doubt where "the shoe pinches." I feel deeply for the disturbed condition of the afflicted ones, and I will do all that is possible to be done to comfort them and to "administer to a mind diseased" that consolation which should be sufficient to restore them to quietude and repose. I can assure them that I hav no intention whatever, at present, of "invading their territory," inasmuch as I can command as many lecturing engagements as I require upon my own account. Moreover, I promis in the name of that "high cultured humanity and loving brotherhood of man" of which, at present, so much is heard but so little is seen, that if the offer of the field secretaryship is made to me I will not accept it without conferring in all humility with the other lecturers in the American Freethought field. I will also do my best to prevent Secular Thought from in any way injuring other "Liberal papers," and if in spite of all my efforts I should fail to restore tranquillity to the disconsolate ones, I will remove with Secular Thought to Siberia, Timbuctoo, or some other foreign land where perhaps, even in the midst of semi barbarism, an unfortunate Englishman may be permitted to work without the dread of wounding the tender susceptibilities of, and calling forth heartfelt denunciations from, individuals similar in misfortune to the stars of Liberalism in enlightened America. After thus supplying the "balm of Gilead," is it too much to hope that mental health will be restored and that "principles, not men," will engage the attention of those who so loudly profess to be working for the "common good?" Personally I can realize more pleasure in useful work than in childish disputations and zealous bickering, and therefore I shall continue to employ my time and energy in seeking to strengthen that movement which every Freethinker should hav dear at heart. In the words of the "immortal bard,"

> Pardon what I hav spoke,
> For 'tis a studied, not a present thought,
> By duty ruminated.

CHARLES WATTS.

Mr. Charlesworth and the American Secular Union.

In reading the article of the Hon. A. Schell, of Knight's Ferry, Cal., I thought a short statement would not be amiss.

The principal reason why Mr. Westbrook was unanimously re-elected was that he wanted to stay in the office to finish the work in regard to the handbook on Morals, on which two years hav been consumed, discriminating between the value of the several manuscripts. Being an eminently moral man himself, the congress thought that any book on morality which secured his recommendation would be eminently fit to ladle ready-made morality out from, in teaspoonful doses, to the coming Secular adolescents.

If the name of Charles Watts had been mentioned at the congress as the official candidate, the recommendation of the congress would certainly hav been given with such hearty emphasis that nobody else would hav had a ghost of a show. This was not done. No intimation of any such purpose was given, but Charlesworth on the contrary was presented to and recommended by the congress.

The administration showing that it was inimical to the candidate, and the treatment he received while addressing the congress, made all the present members more solid in his support than they otherwise would hav been.

Mr. Schell goes into the mutual admiration business.

His recommendation of Mr. Watts's merits goes for naught.

There is not a Freethinker in this country who does not know what Mr. Watts is and how valuable to the cause. That is entirely out of the question, and nobody denies it. The point is, hav the administration the moral (they are great on morality) right to snub, to insult, and discard a gentleman whom the whole congress indorsed as unanimously as they re-elected Mr. Westbrook? Is it a part of the beautiful policy of the administration to insinuate that Mr. Charlesworth is not a moral man ("fit to be received in our families")? If the administration hav anything to say against the moral conduct of John Charlesworth, if they can show that he is unfit to be received in our families, they should openly make the Liberal public acquainted with the facts, and if they can prove this it will settle the matter at once; and if they cannot the recommendation of the congress should be ratified.

The trouble with Mr. Charlesworth seems to be that he is too radical and that he has no respect for the feelings of Christians, Unitarians, and other bipeds of that ilk. Having had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Watts twice, I dare state that he is not a whit more delicate on that subject. Moreover, the Atheists, Spiritualists, and Agnostics, who form the great bulk of the supporters of the Union, admire just such traits, and a traveling pansy-peddler, who would not from time to time slap the Christ-God squarely in the face, would probably not be much to their taste.

Personally, I hav not the slightest regard for the theistical feelings of anybody, and must confess that until now I hav yet to meet the first Christian who had any respect for my feelings on any subject whatever.

If we are going to pander to the prejudices of the Christians, we had better hire some Unitarian, God in the green-and-blue minister and send him on the road with a certificate of moral character and his church diploma in his pocket. Then our well-beloved field secretary could dead beat his way on half fare railway tickets, like all the other well-beloved servants of Jehovah in the land.

Separation of church and state, church taxation, etc., are fine principles. But can they be better advocated than by open and square exposing of the humbug on which the whole matter rests? On demonstrating that Jehovah is a myth, it follows logically that any favor shown to his church by the community at large is an absurdity, and if there are people bent on adoring a myth they should pay their own piper.

If we will hav to bolster the American Secular Union up by affiliating with other societies; if the American Secular Union cannot keep its banner floating by the unaided efforts of the Infidels of this broad country; if we must try to wheedle monetary and moral (?) support under the false pretense of not being opposed to religion, we may as well throw up the sponge, dig its grave, and write on it, Requiescat in pace.

Moreover, not a single clergyman in the country would in the least be hoodwinked. The clergy know on what side their bread is buttered. Those that antagonize the church in any way whatever, even only by trying for taxation, are taken by them as enemies of religion.

The parting advice of, "Stop wrangling and come down with your cash," does not sound very well in Liberal ears. Why in the name of common sense should anybody come down with the cash if he had not the right to say how it should be used or whether it be paid toward an action which he deems unjust?

There has not in all the controversy been shown one good, substantial reason why John Charlesworth should not be appointed, unless it be the sweet will of the administration, which may be good enough reason to Mr. Sobell, but seems to me and others nothing but an arbitrary abuse of power.

DE LE PINASSE, Life-member.

The Quarrel in the Union.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With your permission, I would like space for a few thoughts on the seemingly interminable question of a field secretary for the American Secular Union. The recent discussion of that question has apparently aroused a feeling of personal enmity that threatens to result in a situation that may sadly disturb the harmony that should exist among Freethinkers if they expect to accomplish any good by their efforts in advancing the principles of Liberal Freethought.

Freethinkers hav said and written much in denunciation of the tendency of religion, especially Christianity, to cause contention, discord, and strife, that in the past hav, and in the future may not only estrange friends but cause death and destruction in their most dire form.

Perhaps it may seem impertinent in me to claim, or even wish, to say a word on this subject. I am not a member of the Secular Union, because for twenty years I hav by ill health been shut in from the world of business and social life. But I hav been and am a Freethinker, and wish to be a Liberal one; therefore I am very anxious that all who wish to advance the cause of Liberal Freethought, and especially those who occupy by right the position of speakers and leaders, should be careful, considerate, and just to all.

The president of the American Secular Union may hav been a little hasty in what he said and did at the Portsmouth convention, but he seemed ready and anxious to harmonize, and from the published accounts it looked as though it was accomplished, and at the close of the convention all felt friendly and ready to work together with a hearty good will for the advancement of the cause.

Perhaps the president and secretary may hold opinions that seem foreign to the Nine Demands, but it looks as though they were honest, energetic workers for the best interest of the Union, as they understand it.

The president's published articles hav been short, argumentativ, and to the point, and he seems to hav maintained his position by reference to the constitution and by-laws of the Union.

Miss Craddock is evidently a zealous worker, and the insinuations that as she receives a salary she might also perform the duties of field secretary seem asking too much.

The published articles of several of the gentlemen seem in some respects too radical and personal to accomplish the desired object, and only serve as firebrands that may destroy the harmony and usefulness of the organization.

As Mr. Charlesworth was only recommended by the convention, and the executiv board cannot agree in regard to his appointment, would it not be well to drop the whole matter for the present, and leave to lecturers now in the field the work as in former years, and induce as many new ones to engage in it as possible? The field is abundantly large for all good ones.

Let all true Liberals unite harmoniously, and sustain the cause by precept and example, as well as by financial aid, ever showing by kind words and good works that Freethinkers are in advance of Bible religionists in their desire for the good of humanity, by pursuing their work in a spirit of charity that will show that their efforts to defeat the union of church and state, the Sunday laws, the Bible in schools, and in favor of enacting laws for the taxation of church property, are for the general good, and that they will continue to urge the adoption of their principles, by every consistent and legal means in their power, without resort to any fight among themselvs or with others. "Let us hav peace." CONVERSE CLOSE.

Grattan, Mich., Feb. 25 1891.

An Eminent Evolutionist's Demise.

The writer has just returned from the funeral of Prof. H. D. Garrison, which was held at his home, 3625 Vincennes avenue, this city, where this stalwart Freethinker breathed his last, Monday, at midnight.

Prof. E. S. Bastian, his lifelong friend and admirer, spoke in tender pathos over the remains, of the aims, work, and accomplishments of the departed, and the remains were then taken to Graceland cemetery for interment.

After a reference to Professor Garrison's career, Professor Bastian said:

"I should do scant justice to the memory of Dr. Garrison if I did not speak of his relations to the philosophical thought of the time.

"He was a chemist, a physicist, a naturalist. But he should not be estimated as a mere specialist.

"He was pre eminently a philosopher, and as such deeply interested and closely identified with the great intellectual movements of our time.

"He was a believer in the modern renaissance, and accepted unflinchingly the petty persecution and social obloquy for teaching a doctrin so repellant to the traditions of society and of the church. I do not believe he would hav flinched had he lived in the days of Giordano Bruno and seen before him the martyr's pyre."

No religious nor pretense of religious ceremony marred the funeral of this scholar, philosopher, and friend.

Professor Garrison was born in Dearborn county, Ind., Oct. 5 1834 and completed his education at a Cincinnati medical college. At the breaking out of the rebellion, he served as first assistant surgeon in the Fourth Indiana Volunteers.

After Appomatox, he returned to Cincinnati, and for a while practiced medicin. He then came to Chicago and established the drug firm of Garrison & Clark, which continued for years at 511 State street. The enterprise and public spirit of Professor Garrison is shown by the fact that he, shortly after coming to Chicago, became the leading light in the founding of Bennett Medical College. For years he filled the chair of chemistry in that institution. In 1878 he resigned and started on a year's lecture tour in the Old World.

While in the world's metropolis, he met and won Miss Marie Harold, who survives him.

He had started out on a professional tour, and ended it in a honeymoon. After spending several months in Rome, Egypt, and the Holy Land, the professor with his bride returned to Chicago, where he accepted the chair of chemistry in the College of Pharmacy, and later was created dean, a position he retained till November last. He resigned to enter the lecture field, where he proposed to devote the remainder of his life.

He proposed giving ocular demonstrations of the truths of astronomy and geology, as he doubtless possessed the largest collection of photographic views on scientific subjects of any individual extant.

His lecture season had advanced but two weeks when he was stricken down by illness, but which at first no one considered dangerous.

Professor Garrison was an authority on the subjects of astronomy, geology, and paleontology, and the author of several books and pamphlets of almost world-wide renown.

So conscientious and devoted was he to the Liberal cause, that, even while holding such responsible and public positions, he several times engaged the Grand Opera House, and, at great financial loss, gave a course of scientific lectures, the best demonstrations of the evolution theory ever given in Chicago. He believed in calling "a spade a spade," to use his own expression. He was not only free from superstition himself, but would not cringe nor cater to the superstitious. Professor Garrison was a moral hero who made sacrifices that others less bold and defiant might safely and honestly tread the path of life. He had a wholesome contempt for a large class of Liberal hypocrits—quite numerous in our midst—and despised cant in every form. As a friend he was firm, staunch, and unwavering; as a man and citizen he was as honest in his transactions as he was chivalrous in his opinions. In these periods of hollow pretense and hypocrisy the cause of Liberalism can ill spare such an example of truth and honor. In the death of Professor Garrison aggressiv Liberalism loses an intellectual giant.

Chicago, Feb. 26 1891. E A. STEVENS.

Must Make It a Campaign Issue.

Our legislature is now within four days of adjournment, and has done nothing in the line of taxing church property. We presented the largest list of petitioners, perhaps, that was ever presented to a legislature of the state. There were over ten thousand names. They came from all sections of the state. I was present at the capital when the legislature met, and canvassed the members as to their views on the subject of taxing church property, and I found quite a large number that seemed to favor it, but when the time for action came they almost universally went back on it. J. D. Garfield, of Coos county, a fearless Freethinker, was about the only one that was solid. A majority of the other members are demagogs expecting political promotion. I am of the opinion that the only way to get the law exempting church property from taxation in this state repealed will be to make it an issue in the campaign before the people. To elect men with a tacit understanding that they favor taxation of church and other ecclesiastical property without an open pledge, is not by any means a safe way, for when they begin to feel the pressure of the church power the courage of their convictions fails them. The matter in the state senate was treated with contempt, and no word in vindication of the petitioners was offered, although it was claimed that we had at least one outspoken Freethinker in that body who was expected to urge and support the measure.

I inclose an editorial from the daily Oregonian of February 12th, which will giv a better idea of the liberality and true statesmanship of the present Oregon senate. The Oregonian is one of the ablest and most widely circulated newspapers on the Pacific coast, and its editor, although thought to really be Agnostic in his private sentiments, but who usually caters to popular religious feeling, overhauls the senate for their outrageous want of respect for the wishes of the people.

I am satisfied that a very large majority of the people, through the country districts particularly, are in favor of taxation of church property. I think the petition in my neighborhood was presented to one hundred and twelve persons just as they were cursorily met, and one hundred and ten signed it, only two refusing. Our minister (that is, not my minister, but the preacher of the village) signed it, and quite a number of church-members. And I presume this is a fair sample for a large part of the state from the number of petitioners.

LEE LAUGHLIN.

North Yamhill, Ore., Feb. 17, 1891.

WHAT THE OREGONIAN SAID.

The action of the state senate in refusing courteous treatment to petitions asking for the taxation of all church property is not to be commended. Without discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of such legislation, it is but the exact truth to say that the question of the taxation of church property is everywhere recognized as an entirely proper subject for respectful legislativ treatment. President Grant and President Garfield both favored the taxation of church property. Many of the ablest men in all parties favor it, and it has been a subject of respectful consideration and debate before the legislatures of Massachusetts and New York. Many of the leading ministers of the great Baptist church hav declared that they do not believe in the exemption of church property from taxation, beyond the church edifice actually used for worship; and not a few ministers in all churches are in favor of full taxation of everything owned by the church. On the question of the exemption of church property there is much to be said on both sides. It is a perfectly legitimate, non-political public question, upon which men of excellent intelligence and ability widely differ, and the petition of the German Turn-verein, of Portland, deserved respectful treatment at the hand of a body that is its legislature and the legislature of the whole people.

With the rapid increase in the value of property in the large cities and towns of the East and middle West the exemption of all church property has become a severe public burden, such as was never contemplated in the early days of the republic, and when so able a man and so sound a lawyer as Ex-Governor Hoadly of Ohio urges reformatory legislation, we may believe that the abuse is real and relief necessary. The burden of taxation is bitterly felt as our civilization grows older, and the time will come when Oregon, like the East, will not disdain the consideration of the question which our state senate has dismissed with contempt. At present it is probable that the weight of public opinion is against the taxation of church edifices, or of charitable, benevolent, or educational institutions, whether managed by church corporations or not. There are reasons for exempting the latter which do not even apply to church edifices. The state does not undertake to inculcate religion or to encourage public worship. Therefore the exemption of church edifices is a little illogical. It is done, however, in obedience to a sentiment nearly universal, and the opposition to it makes small headway. The state does support education, on the other hand, and maintain public charities. It is perfectly logical and reasonable therefore that it should aid private enterprises which supplement its own work in this direction to the extent of paying the taxes on their property, as it does when it declares them exempt.

Lectures and Meetings.

The Indians and the Missionaries.

I hav spent twenty-four years of my life among the wild Indians of the northwest. My occupation during that period was divided as follows: three years, from the spring of 1867 till the spring of 1870, as a soldier at Fort Rice, Dak.; three years keeping a woodyard on the Missouri river; six months guide for General Custer; two years teaching in a mission school at Cheyenne river agency, Dak.; five years interpreter for Gen. Wm. P. Carlin, at Standing Rock agency, Dak.; six months a scout at Fort Custer, Mont.; three years a scout at Fort Buford, Dak.; three years in the mining regions of Montana, and four years among the frontier settlements along the Missouri river in Dakota. These twenty-four years hav been replete with experience. The famous "peace policy" had just been adopted by the government in the management of Indian affairs when I reached the Indian country in 1867. This "peace policy" consisted in turning over the entire management of Indian agencies to the churches. Under this rule everybody expected to see the Indian service purified, wars cease, and the Indian himself rapidly evoluted from his primitiv, savage condition to a state of civilization. And how perfectly natural it was that the people should expect this, when Christians repeatedly claim for their religion great civilizing influence. And now, after a trial of twenty-five years, during which time the Indian "ship of state" has been manned by a "gospel crew," with hooded monks and sanctimonious "Bible-bangers" in command, and "sky-pilots" at the helm, what is the result? Must the shameful, humiliating story of crime and fiendish outrage be told, and published to the world, in order to awaken the American people to a realizing sense of what they hav done, and are still doing? For the system still prevails. Are the people blind, that they cannot see the smoke of battle that hangs like a funeral pall over the beautiful valley of the Little Big Horn? Are Custer and his three hundred brave followers forgotten? Are the people deaf, that they hear not the rattle of musketry and the booming of cannon at the Pine Ridge agency? Does the preacher pound the pulpit and bray so loudly to the skies that the people cannot hear the shrieks of pain and terror, and the groans of the dying Indian women and children shot down in the battle (?) at Wounded Kuee? Can they not hear the sobs of the mothers, the sisters, and the wives and little ones of those who fell among the soldiers in that battle? Surely, "these things were not done in a corner." The Dakota hills are still reverberating with the sounds of battle. Go back with me through the last twenty-five years and you can trace the course of this gospel ship as she sailed from year to year, by the wrecks and devastation and the filth left in her track. Oh, great is the Indian agent of the Christians!

Under this arrangement, of course the Christian missionary has everything his own way. In the first place, a man to be eligible for appointment as Indian agent must be recommended by his church to the board of Christian missions in Washington, who, if they find him sound in the faith, giv him their indorsement. There are in the United States about eighty-five agencies. These are divided among the several leading denominations. In the country where I hav been, the patronage is about equally divided among the Catholics, Protestant Episcopals, Presbyterians, and Methodists. There seems, however, to be no difference between them. They are all alike after filthy lucre, all thieves and robbers—yes, murderers, for by their dishonest practices in withholding from the Indians what justly belonged to them, and what the government had provided for them, they were driven to hostilities. One instance will be sufficient to illustrate the way these Christian agents hav of doing business. In 1875, one year before General Custer was killed, the agent at Standing Rock agency, who was a devout communicant of the Catholic church, stated in his official report to the commissioner of Indian affairs that there were 7,300 Indians enroled at that agency; the government therefore provided for that number. The cost value of these provisions, in round numbers, amounted to $40 per capita for one year. Now, the fact was, there were less than 2,000 Indians at that agency in that year. But while the government was providing for 7,300, the less than 2,000 who really were there were compelled to kill their ponies for food, and were driven by hunger to join Sitting Bull's band, which swelled his numbers with starving, desperate Indians, and made it possible for him to meet and defeat Custer in 1876.

In this instance the agent was defrauding the government of the cost of provisions for 5,500 Indians whose only existence was on paper, a sum total of $220 000 per year. Not satisfied with the theft of this enormous sum, he even robs what few Indians are at the agency. Finally, to prevent a general uprising, General Carlin arrested the agent and sent him out of the country. But another equally bad was soon appointed to the place. And so it has been at nearly all the agencies, and it is still going on, and will as long as the church has control.

The missions are not one whit better—they could not be worse. They are all money-making concerns. I was employed two years at a mission as teacher and interpreter, and I know whereof I speak. But to read the doleful, whining, miserable lies written by these Christian missionaries, and published in the Christian organs back East, one would think them just too good for anything this side of paradise. They tell how wonderfully the Lord is blessing the good work, how eagerly the poor benighted Indian embraces the savior, and the only thing lacking is money to carry on this labor of love, and won't the good people contribute more liberally of the store with which the Lord has blessed them? As for themselvs, if they hav hardships to endure, if they hav given up the comforts of a good home back in the states, deprived themselvs of the pleasures of society; if they hav consented to become household drudges, to do the cooking, washing, and scrubbing, why, they glory in it. They are so glad that they can do something for the dear savior. They expected trials and tribulations, "praise the Lord!" And while they are doing so much for Jesus, the dear, good people ought to send them more money. Money, money, money—you can hear it jingling all the way down through the pages of their correspondence. You can hear it ringing in the tones of their voices. You can see it shining in their glances. Money, money, money, is the first and the last verse of their song, and money is their chorus.

But you hav read these letters yourselvs. They are all very much alike. If there is any variation, it is not on the subject of contributions. Now let me present the facts—plain, unembellished facts. In the first place, there are no hardships in the life of a missionary among the North American Indians. There might hav been years ago, and doubtless were, but that time has long since passed. There is no drudgery, no housework outside of the mission parlor. Indian girls do all the hard work, while the female members of the missionary service liv like ladies born to wealth and distinction. Each one has her maid. Bedroom work, and dining-room and kitchen work, are entirely beneath her station. And as to her being deprived of society, and giving up a good home and all that, bless her dear heart, she never had a better home in her life. The chances are that she had to wade around in the filth of a cow-stable and do the milking twice a day before she got a job as stewardess on the gospel ship. And she certainly was never admitted to better society than she finds at a frontier post. The wives and daughters of the army officers are of the very best society, bright, intelligent, and sociable. They hav their regular weekly hops and entertainments, and the ladies of the mission are invited. They always attend, and they don't go afoot either. They ride in a carriage behind fine horses, driven by a coachman. Why, if they had to giv up the luxuries of a prosperous mission and go back to the humdrum life at their old house, they would die of ennui. Poor things, send them more money.

And how about the male missionary, the boss of the ranche, who has given up all for Jesus, and is wearing away his precious life in the service of the master? Go with me into the mission library and here we find him at his daily toil. But it's all for the Lord, so he doesn't mind it. He is only too glad that he has found something to do for the savior. But he could do so much more if the dear people back East would send him some more money. Lack of money sadly retards the spread of the gospel. If the widows would only put more mites in the box, and send the box to him, it would enable him to do wonders. He sits in a large upholstered armchair, and is just now writing a letter to the Boston weekly Brand Snatcher, setting forth the fact that another soul is born into the kingdom. He had yesterday baptized another Indian baby, but in order to continue the good work he must hav more money. The letter finished, he rises from his chair, goes to a cupboard, from which he takes a bottle of Mumm's Extra Dry, turns out a glassful, and takes a drink. This reminds him that he must write for more money. Poor man, he's been struggling along with only three bottles of champagne a day, and it won't do. He can't bear up under it. His arduous duties, which require him to write sometimes as many as two letters in one day, and to stand in a pulpit and talk nearly an hour every Sunday, are too much to expect from a man of his caliber, and while it is quite true that he owns a large herd of cattle that graze free of charge upon the Indian reservation, and are tended by Indian herders who receive their pay in old clothes that are given to the mission by Christian dupes in the East, and said cattle, grazing on an Indian reservation, being exempt from taxation; and while he is a large stockholder and director in the First National Bank of Pierre, S. D., yet he needs more money. My dear, good Christian people, send him more money.

An Open Letter to the President.

To Mr. Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, Sir: I am informed that an application has been made for the pardon of Mr. Ezra H. Heywood, who was convicted of a violation of the obscenity laws in Boston on May 13, 1890, and sentenced by Judge George M. Carpenter to two years' imprisonment in Charlestown state prison, and I am requested to urge such reasons as are in my knowledge of the case in support of the application.

Upon the trial of Mr. Heywood I acted with Mr. George W. Searle, of Boston, as the defendant's counsel, and I cheerfully comply, inasmuch as I consider that a great injustice has been done Mr. Heywood, which should be redressed as far as is now possible, not for Mr. Heywood's sake alone, but for the purpose of maintaining in their integrity all the guarantees of liberty which were in former years the safeguard and protection of the citizen.

Mr. Heywood was convicted of a violation of Section 3893 U. S. Rev. St., upon an indictment setting forth certain matters published by him in the Word, a monthly paper of which he has been for the last seventeen years the editor, which matters were alleged to be obscene. The gravamen of the offense, as will be seen by an inspection of the statute, is the depositing, or causing to be deposited, in the mail, the prohibited matter.

As to the matter in question which it is pretended is obscene. This matter forms part of the record and is open for inspection. No evasion or misrepresentation can change the quality of that matter. It is absolutely fixed. It is fastened down into cold type just as Mr. Heywood intended to print it, and it appears upon the record just as he intended to publish it. I maintain that it is not "obscene" within the meaning of the law nor within any fair and just application of the language of the statute. Nothing that transpired upon the trial tended in any way to convince me of the contrary, or to change the views which I originally had upon that point. I am deeply impressed with the purity of Mr. Heywood's motivs and firmly convinced of the urgent necessity of his doing just the thing that he has done. The publication which called out the most determined antagonism from the prosecution is that set forth in the indictment as the second count, and upon the trial referred to as "The Mother Article." I desire here and now to say that I regard that article as the purest and most holy utterance upon the subject of which it treats that I hav ever seen in print, and I know that Mr. Heywood so regarded it. It was because I thought this that I sent it to Mr. Heywood originally, using the mails as a means of conveying it to him, as I had an absolute right to do. I do not overlook the fact that there are great diversities of thought and that there is room for honest difference of opinion upon this subject, arising from the varied education and experience of individuals. It is for that very reason that I insist that in such a case as the present it is a grievous and oppressiv wrong to submit to a jury a mere question of conventional taste or an abstract and unsettled question of ethics, under circumstances calculated to arouse the bitter prejudices of the thoughtless, as was done in this case.

As to the question of "depositing in the mails." Upon this point the testimony of the prosecution and that of the defense did not materially vary. The main facts are these: Mr. Heywood on the afternoon in question went to the post-office in Princeton at about five minutes before the time for closing the mails. He took with him a basket of his papers wrapped ready for mailing. The papers were weighed, and instead of collecting the postage thereon the postmaster's clerk, contrary to law, and in violation of his duty, made a charge upon his books against Mr. Heywood in a running account opened and which for some time had been kept open for that purpose. Mr. Heywood then said, "I want those papers to go out by this afternoon's mail." The clerk refused to send them out by that mail and stated as a reason that some questions had been suggested by the authorities in Washington as to the character of Mr. Heywood's publication. Mr. Heywood having taken the papers to the office with the intention of mailing them, and having met with a refusal of his request that they go out in the next mail, which at that time was not yet closed, and not having paid any postage upon them, stood in loco penitentiæ, and he thereupon demanded the return of his papers. This was refused. In the evening of the same day Mr. Heywood called upon the postmaster and pointed out to him the decision of Judge Field in ex parte Jackson, 6 Otto 733, wherein that judge said: "Nor can regulations be enforced against the transportation of printed matter in the mail, which is open to examination, so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation, the publication would be of little value. If, therefore, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress;" and the decision of Judge Benedict in United States vs. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. 358, wherein that judge said: "Such matter may be sent by express without violating any law of the United States;" and thereupon again demanded the return of his papers so that he might send them to his subscribers by express or other means, as under these decisions he had a right to do, and thereby avoid any question as to the legality of his act. This demand was refused by the postmaster, although the papers demanded had not been mailed, but were still in the possession of the postmaster and were illegally detained by him in his office. At the close of the testimony the judge was requested to charge the jury as to this question of depositing, as follows:

XXX.

That if the defendant merely attempted to mail the packages and did not complete the act himself, or attempted to deposit for mailing and delivery the matters as charged in the indictment and if prepayment in cash or postage stamps was not made on the papers offered by the defendant there was no offense.

XXXIII.

That if the defendant merely and only put the papers into the weighing-scales, on the counter of the store of the postmaster, for weighing, and the postmaster refused to allow them to be deposited in the mails and took and kept them for his own examination, or for the examination of other authorities at home, or at the seat of the United States government with a view to determining whether they were mailable or not, and they were never any further or otherwise attempted to be mailed by the defendant, or by the postmaster, then the government has not proven this part of its case, and the defendant for that reason should be acquitted.

XXXIV.

That if, in addition, Mr. Heywood the next day demanded, or asked of the postmaster the return of the papers left for inspection and was refused that demand is evidence to be considered by the jury that he did not intend to deposit the papers for mailing and delivery.

XXXVI.

That if, when the papers were brought to the postmaster, he refused to mail them until after an examination, there was, up to that time, no deposit in the mails for mailing and delivery, and if, afterward Mr. Heywood demanded the return of the papers and the postmaster refused to return them, but mailed them instead, the postmaster cannot be considered Mr. Heywood's agent for such mailing and the mailing was not the defendant's act.

XXXVII.

That, unless the jury find that subsequent to the conversation with the postmaster about the mailability of the papers and the postmaster's refusal to mail them, the defendant intended that they should be mailed, he is entitled to acquittal.

XXXVIII.

That the defendant's demand for the return of the papers to him is one of the facts to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not he intended to deposit the papers in the mail for mailing and delivery at any time after the postmaster's refusal to accept them without examination.

XXXIX.

That it is for the jury to determin from all the evidence whether the intent of the defendant in leaving the papers with the postmaster on April 28, 1890, was that they should be deposited in the mail for mailing and delivery, or that they should be examined by the postmaster to ascertain if they were mailable or not, and if they were simply left to abide the result of an examination with no intent to deposit them for mailing, if they should be found to be non-mailable, defendant must be acquitted.

These, with a number of other requests, very carefully prepared by my associate and myself, many of them being accurate quotations from the opinions of other judges in similar cases, were brushed aside by the judge, who made not even a pretense of any deliberate consideration of them. They were simply ignored, and the points they raised were not submitted to the jury in any form except as shown in the judge's charge. Upon this point, as to deposit, the judge, in his charge, said: "He need not hav deposited," thereby implying that Mr. Heywood did deposit the papers in the mails. Again, the judge said: "It was stated by both the postmaster and the prisoner that the prisoner brought a basket of papers to the post-office and put them on the counter, offering them thus to the postmaster for the purpose of sending them through the mails. That constitutes the act of depositing them in the mails for transmission and answers that question in the affirmativ." It will be seen that the judge here states to the jury half the truth, which is always more dangerous than an entire falsehood, and omits any mention of the postmaster's refusal to mail the papers in the regular course, of the fact that the postage was not paid, and of the fact of Mr. Heywood's demand for the return of the papers under the law which guaranteed their free transmission in other ways than by mail.

The whole conduct of the trial gave me the impression that it was the fixed determination of the judge at the outset to get Mr. Heywood into prison by any means, fair or foul. At the opening, I invoked the most patient, diligent, and painstaking receptivity on the part of the court, and called attention to the violent prejudice of the ignorant masses against any discussion of topics relating to sex. The judge cast a vacant gaze all around the room, and then answered me that he did not see any prejudice, as if prejudice were a palpable entity that could be seen by looking for it. Many such incidents might be mentioned to show the evasivness and insincerity of the court, but I will call attention to only two.

Mr. Heywood testified that, in pursuance of what he considered his parental duty, he had instructed his children in the relations of the sexes, and, for purposes of instruction, had shown them pictures of the reproductiv organs of both sexes. In summing up, the prosecution alluded to this item of testimony and stated that Mr. Heywood had shown his children "obscene" pictures. I endeavored to get the judge to correct that false, damaging, and unfair statement. The success I met with, and the kind of correction that was made, will be seen at the end of the judge's charge.

A detectiv was called who testified to sending for Mr. Heywood's paper and receiving copies of it in due course of mail, also to an interview with Mr. Heywood, in narrating which he represented Mr. Heywood as expressing a desire to avoid detection and as saying that he did not sell the papers to every one, but only to him (the detectiv) as a special favor, and that he (the detectiv) must be very careful and secretiv about it, as spies were about, etc.

This kind of testimony was introduced with the purpose of making it appear that Mr. Heywood was doing his work surreptitiously, and of misrepresenting his motivs in such a way as to excite the prejudice of the jury against him. Except as to the matter of receiving the papers by mail, this kind of testimony was, under the judge's ruling in this very case, wholly irrelevant. All attempts on the part of Mr. Heywood to show the motiv for his conduct were rigidly excluded, the judge holding that the motiv of the defendant was not material and not to be taken into consideration as an element of the defense. Yet, by permitting this trick to succeed, a very false impression of Mr. Heywood's motivs and purposes, which motivs and purposes, I insist, were of the very essence of the question to be tried, was allowed to be conveyed to the jury. If such an impression did prevail among the jury, and I believe it did, nothing could be further from the truth. The real fact was that Mr. Heywood had been publishing his paper for about seventeen years. He had openly mailed and sent it to his subscribers and to those who wanted it. He had not obtruded it upon anyone. No person was produced upon the trial who had been injured by Mr. Heywood's publication, nor anyone produced who was even offended by it. I do not believe it was possible for the prosecution to hav produced any such person outside of the little clique who were pecuniarily interested in tormenting Mr. Heywood. It may hav been true that Mr. Heywood, in his conversation with this detectiv, expressed a desire to avoid contact with those who for many years had carried on a brutal persecution against him. That is quite natural. But that Mr. Heywood, by any language he may hav used at that time, should hav conceded, intimated, or intended in any way to convey the impression that he was engaged in underhanded, secret, or illicit business, is so contrary to the nature of the man, so at variance with the record of his whole public and private life, and so inconsistent with the very outspokenness which has been the means of furnishing a pretext for his tormentors to bring him again into court, that no intelligent person not subject to the vicious influences with which this jury were surrounded can believe the detectiv's story in the way he and the prosecution intended it to be believed. Yet that story was invested with as much weight as if it had been true or credible.

It is unfortunate that no minutes of the testimony were preserved. The judge's charge to the jury, however, has been accurately reported and printed in order that Mr. Heywood's friends may see something of the character of the trial. I annex a copy herewith.* No lawyer can read this charge without a deep sense of the degradation brought upon his profession by such instructions from a judge to a jury. The idea of a judge charging a jury in a criminal trial that "The way of the transgressor is hard!" The idea of a judge charging a jury in a case of this nature that "the statute is plain, clear, and distinct," when, in United States vs. Comerford, 25 Federal Reporter 902, Judge Turner, a judge at least equally entitled to respect as Judge Carpenter, had, with very great reason, characterized this infamous statute in the following language:

> We hav been taught to believe that it was the greatest injustice toward the common people of old Rome, when the laws they were commanded to obey, under Caligula, were written in small characters and hung upon high pillars, thus more effectually to ensnare the people. How much advantage may we justly claim over the old Roman if our criminal laws are so obscurely written that one cannot tell when he is violating them? If the rule contended for here is to be applied to the defendant, he will be put on trial for an act which he could not by perusing the law hav ascertained was an offense. My own sense of justice revolts at the idea. It is not in keeping with the genius of our institutions, and I cannot giv it my sanction.

The idea of a judge charging a jury, "Nevertheless we ought to punish him." All these things are simply revolting to the common sense of justice.

The proceedings upon the trial were vindictiv and brutal to the last degree. The monstrosity of it is plain when we consider that all this outrage is done under pretense of promoting purity. Purity is not consistent with trickery and it will not do to assert purity while practicing such methods. The methods employed to get Mr. Heywood into prison do not incline any thoughtful person to respect the moral purity of those who employ such methods. The pretense of ultra purity is too transparent. The strained effort to appear shocked at Mr. Heywood's utterances deceives nobody. Will any thinking person who sees a judge employing such methods to compass the imprisonment of a man he is bound by the most solemn obligations to protect, believe that judge to be any less brutal in his sexual relations with women, or any less vindictiv in his daily dealings with his fellowmen?

I make this statement solemnly impressed with its truthfulness, with the rectitude of Mr. Heywood's conduct and motivs, and with the necessity of bringing the methods pursued in this case to the attention of those whose business it is to provide remedies for such wrongs. I would suggest that provisions facilitating appeals and compelling the employment of official stenographers in all criminal cases would furnish very wholesome checks upon the tendency to arbitrariness on the part of United States judges. I regard this matter as one of paramount importance to the whole American people.

In the hope that you will arrive at such a conclusion as will tend to establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty, I submit this statement to you. You will act hereupon according to your capability.

Very respectfully, ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

10 Wall st., New York, Feb. 14, 1891.

Sustain Liberty's Defenders Now.

The Defense Association has expended the small balance of its general fund (and more too) for several hundred pamphlets of four kinds: first, Mr. Julian Hawthorne's letter to the Twentieth Century on the Heywood case and the general principles involved; second, Mr. Chamberlain's letter to President Harrison in behalf of Mr. Heywood; third, Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost's address on Harman's first indictment. These are all valuable literature to show the abuse of the Comstock law, and the outrageous treatment that such cases receive in the United States courts of justice (!) in order to construe the law against well-meaning reformers and defenders of the liberty of the press. There are important issues to be fought out in these cases, and they are well discussed on the side of liberty and progress in these three pamphlets; but we hav also obtained from Mr. Harman, the publisher, two hundred copies of a fourth pamphlet entitled, "An Appeal to the Women of America," written by Mr. C. L. James, to arouse them to the fact that those who defend for them the right of self-control of their own persons, and plead for their release from various existing systems of sexual slavery, are being persecuted in order to suppress the attack made on secret vices that seriously affect the well-being of wives, children, and families. The last pamphlet deals mainly with the case of Mr. Caldwell, of Chicago, the publisher of the Christian Life—one who is working toward reform of some of the same evils that Harman and Heywood hav sought to remedy, but in a different line and way.

All these pamphlets are useful tracts to hand to thoughtful persons who may be expected to take an interest in these matters, and possibly aid our side. One of England's execrated judges of many years ago, Scroggs or Jeffreys, ruled that if anyone should go about instituting a reform he should be found guilty of high treason. The United States Court spies (inspectors), attorneys, and judges are now construing the obscene postal law in a similar manner, and trying to make criminals of those who are to-day promoting necessary reforms. The ruling above quoted was given in a case where some young men pulled down some houses of infamy. Now our "victims" are prosecuted because they would abolish infamous vices and abuses in family life. J. S. Mill has said that vices must be exposed as the first step to their suppression. We invite progressiv workers everywhere to inform themselvs about this modern reactionary crusade and inquisition, by sending to us for these pamphlets, and distributing them where they will awaken thought and new converts. We send all four pamphlets for ten cents, or in lots at twenty cents per dozen. Old friends and new ones are also reminded that the general fund needs replenishing. All subscriptions heretofore received hav been duly acknowledged, and any new ones will be, as usual—ten cents or $10. Bradlaugh's great victories for freedom in printing are, since his death, receiving due recognition. He ought to hav been better sustained and aided when engaged in his noble contests. There are to-day three worthy martyrs struggling bravely and with too little friendly support for the rights and betterment of all. Let them be encouraged and helped to success now, rather than granted a tardy though just appreciation some day in obituary notices. All subscribers to the fund are regarded as corresponding members. WE would fain again call the attention of our readers to the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text Book." It is the most unique work in Freethought literature and has excited the most friendly encomiums and the most bitter denunciations. Our Anarchistic Friend Pentecost.

Mr. H. O Pentecost has an unhappy way of wandering wide from the paths of accuracy and fact to make it appear that Liberals are illiberal and no more just than the church folks. This is, we presume, because he once recklessly made the assertion; and though afterward induced by THE TRUTH SEEKER to take it back, he seems to delight to return to the subject.

In one of his letters to Freethought Samuel P. Putnam said that "the government of Mexico to-day is the most Liberal government on the face of the earth." To substantiate this statement Mr. Putnam related that a "vast amount of church property has been confiscated. . . . Convents are forbidden. The clericals are not allowed to wear their official garb on the streets. They must dress like other folks. They cannot perform a legal marriage."

To this Mr. Pentecost responds: "I judge that if the Mexican officials should drive the church people out of the country, or make it a capital offense to be a Christian, the Mexican government might be considered still more Liberal. Is the kind of tyranny Mr. Putnam describes his idea of being Liberal? On Mr. Putnam's own showing the Mexican government is exceedingly illiberal toward the Catholic church, quite as illiberal as the church is toward other people. What right should a government hav to confiscate church property, or forbid priests to dress as they please, or not recognize the legality of the marriage they solemnize?"

If Mr. Pentecost had stopped for a moment to think he would not hav written this, or at least he would hav seen the reason for it.

The church property of Mexico had to be confiscated because the church had stolen it from the people. By exemptions, fees, laws in favor of ecclesiasticism, and a general working upon the superstitious fears of the ignorant Mexicans, rich and poor alike, the church had gathered the wealth of the country into her hands. Taking it back was but an act of restitution, as a policeman forces a thief to disgorge. It was simply making the church start over again and start square, giving the people a chance to choose what to do, where before they had been compelled to support the church.

Convents are a part of the church's huge system of imposiure and spoliation. Women hav been befooled into giving their lives and their means to the church, and the convents are the jails for them after they hav been robbed. The vast abuses of the conventual system hav been adequately described. In the United States a nun can get out if she chooses, though with much difficulty, but in countries where the church rules the state, like Spain and old Mexico, the convents were literal prisons, and worse. Their suppression was but the rescuing of prisoners.

What a man shall wear upon the streets is perhaps no government's business; but when one thinks of the abject superstitious regard which the average Roman Catholic has for priestly robes, the wisdom and justice of the prohibition are apparent. It is like protecting children from the bugaboos and specters and ogers which their little imaginations see around them ready to carry them away.

The power of legalizing marriage was taken from the priests because they had made it a means of oppressing and of controling the people. In other Catholic countries as well as in Mexico the church had placed such fees upon it that the great mass of the people were living without regular marriage. The government of Mexico has now given them a chance to make their relations regular and at the same time deprived the church of its great power to rob them.

Mr. Pentecost further says: "While we hav a government the utmost that a Liberal should ask of it with regard to the church is that it should extend it no official aid. While other property is taxed church property should be taxed, but no legislativ discrimination should be made against the church." What shall be done when we do not hav a government is not worth discussing here. But what the government of Mexico has done is just what Mr. Pentecost says it shou'd do—extend no official aid to the church. To bring this about it had first to restore to the people what the church had robbed them of, and let the church go on upon its own hook, supported voluntarily, or not at all, as the people saw fit. And to say that laws depriving the church of its power to rob and oppress are discriminations against the church is to misuse the English language as greatly as it would be to say that laws against theft and slavery are infringements upon personal liberty. Mr. Pentecost stands up so straight for individualism that he leans backward. Let him get into plumb and then he will be right.

Unfair Discrimination.

The Rev. J. B. Caldwell publishes monthly a little paper which he calls the Christian Life. The number before us is devoted to entreating men and women to hav no close sex association unless a child is desired. The little magazine is of an ultra religious character, the writers quoting scripture, and "interpreting" and distorting biblical incidents and sayings, to support their positions. Jesus is frequently referred to, and the divine spirit is alleged to hav taken possession of them so that the Christian livers become purer than the angels and consequently a little better than anyone else on earth. It is full of religious cant, feeble sentiment, and unrestrained ignorance. But the purpose is as we hav said, and the writers are evidently honest, sincere, and imbued with a strong belief that they are right.

Last fall Mr. Caldwell published a number of the magazine called "Marital Purity," an essay written by Charles E. Walker, a Congregational preacher of Sauk Rapids, Minn. He was promptly arrested by McAfee, a Western imitator of Comstock and an employee of a Western "vice society." McAfee seems to hav been inspired by the publication by Mr. Caldwell of a defense of Mr. Harman, both editors working on the same lines. Mr. Caldwell has not yet been brought to trial.

Whenever he issued one of his magazines Mr. Caldwell seems to hav submitted it to the post-office department, and sometimes to Anthony Comstock, and he has so far been promptly answered, either by reference to the local district attorney, or the question being decided by the Washington department, which is—so Mr. Wanamaker affirms—obliged to act when applied to. In this he has been more successful than the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who three weeks ago applied for a decision as to the mailability of a book which was forwarded to the department. The volume was entitled:

THE
HOLY BIBLE,
CONTAINING THE
OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS:
TRANSLATED OUT OF THE ORIGINAL TONGUES;
AND WITH
THE FORMER TRANSLATIONS DILIGENTLY COMPARED AND REVISED.
NEW YORK:
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
INSTITUTED IN THE YEAR MDCCCXVI,
1890.

Now it seems to us that here is a discrimination against the Infidel and in favor of the Christian, which is against the Constitution of the United States. Why cannot THE TRUTH SEEKER Editor obtain from the post-office department an answer to a plain question as well as can the editor of the Christian Life? Mr. Caldwell's publication assumes to be animated by the purpose of promoting purity. That also was the object in calling Mr. Wanamaker's attention to the volume named "The Holy Bible." The book was found to be widely circulated, read in public schools, and even preached from in churches, but complaints as to its purity of language and ideas reached us from all over the country, and we felt it to be our duty, as Mr. Caldwell feels it to be his, to labor for the protection of the young and for the elevation of the whole human race above the standard which the book seems to set. So we sent the book to Washington, but up to this time with no result. Why is it that the Christian is favored by the government and the Infidel ignored?

Will Mr. Wanamaker please answer?

Another Heretic.

Professor C. A. Briggs, recently appointed to the chair of biblical theology in Union Theological Seminary in this city, is being pursued by his orthodox opponents, and it is proposed at the next general assembly of the Presbyterian church to try him for heresy. His inaugural address in his new position will be the basis of the complaint, and the following sentences are the particular specifications, according to a Western Presbyterian editor:

"The Bible is no better than a mass book for stopping a bullet; and is not as good as holy water for putting out a fire. Superstition is no less superstitious if it takes the form of bibliolatry. It may be all the worse if it concentrates itself upon this one thing. There is nothing divine in the text of its letters, words, or clauses The divine authority is not in the style or in the words, but in the concept. The great mass of the Old Testament was written by authors whose names and connection with their writings are lost in oblivion. If this is destroying the Bible the Bible is destroyed already. But who tells us that these traditional names were the authors of the Bible? The Bible itself? The creed of the church? Any reliable testimony? Pure conjectural tradition, nothing more! It is here that the higher criticism comes in. Men cry out that we are destroying the Bible, but it is men's theories about the Bible that we are destroying. We desire to know whether the Bible came from God. There are errors in the scriptures which no one has been able to explain away, and the theory that they were not in the original text is sheer assumption, and no man can rest with certainty upon it. . . Progressiv sanctification after death is the doctrin of the Bible and the church. The bugbear of a judgment immediately after death and of a magical transformation in the dying hour should be banished from the world."

These expressions are rightly regarded by the orthodox of the church as heresy, and the general assembly, which has the veto power over the appointment of professors, will be asked to declare Professor Briggs unsound in the faith, as he certainly is.

"Go on, presbyteries and synods, go on! Thrust the heretics out of the church—that is to say, throw away your brains,—put out your eyes. The Infidels will thank you. They are willing to adopt your exiles. Every deserter from your camp is a recruit for the army of progress. Cling to the ignorant dogmas of the past; read the 109 Psalm; gloat over the slaughter of mothers and babes; thank God for total depravity; shower your honors upon hypocrits, and silence every minister who is touched with that heresy called genius.

"Be true to your history. Turn out the astronomers, the geologists, the naturalists, the chemists, and all honest scientists. With a whip of scorpions, drive them all out. We want them all. Keep the ignorant, the superstitious, the bigoted, and the writers of charges and specifications. Keep them, and keep them all. Repeat your pious platitudes in the drowsy ears of the faithful, and read your Bible to heretics, as kings read some forgotten riot-act to stop and stay the waves of revolution. You are too weak to excite anger. We forgiv your efforts as the sun forgivs a cloud—as the air forgivs the breath you waste."

A Sample Death-Bed Conversion.

A Cincinnati paper recently published a story of a death bed conversion, or reversion, which affords the religious people much consolation. The tale runs in this way:

"As a strong man he defied God; but when death approached he sought him.

"The words might form the truthful epitaph of many a grave.

"It is well that mercy is promised to those who seek it even at the eleventh hour, else the peace of mind of surrounding friends would be destroyed by imaginations that could picture the departed one only in the torments of hell.

"The death-bed scene of George Kellogg Stillman is creating much discussion both among those who, like himself, denounced Christianity, and among his religious friends. Mr. Stillman was a veteran engraver and very well known in this city, where he lived for a long time.

"An attack of pneumonia, aided by a previous stroke of paralysis, rapidly brought him to death's door, and on Saturday one week ago it was seen that he had but a few hours to liv. It was thought best to let him know, and Mr. Samuel Morin, with whom he had lived since the death of his wife ten years before, said to him gently:

"'Mr. Stillman, you are going to die, perhaps before morning.'

"'Yes, I know it,' replied the sick man, calmly, 'I am going to leave you forever—but where? Where will I go?'

"Midnight came, and the dying man's face grew careless again as he playfully remarked that he must make a speech. Strength seemed to be given him for the moment, and words hurried from his ashen lips. He described the glories of ancient Rome and the deeds of great men to his wondering audience, and finished his address with a gasp that looked to be his last. Then a change came over him. The look of pain and trouble again entered his dim eyes. He looked about appealingly.

"'There's something else you want to say?' inquired Mrs. Morin, who sat by his side.

"Then, slowly and painfully, with earnest words, broken by fits of coughing and moments of exhaustion, Mr. Stillman repeated a portion of the Lord's prayer, and when he stopped exhausted he looked up and whispered:

"'He knows the rest.'

"It was seen that Mr. Stillman was repentant, and his devout hostess prayed for him as his life ebbed away. The dying man was now past speech, but his lips kept moving feebly, and in answer to questions as to his belief and penitence he signed an affirmativ. He retained his consciousness to the last and died in peace."

It now turns out that Mr. Stillman had all his life been a Christian, for years a member of a Baptist church, was never known as an Infidel, and that the death-bed scene is a glorious lie for the glory of God.

What won't the Christians do to bolster up their system of imposture!

Editorial Notes.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll is the first and second choice of the senior class of Cornell's law school to address the school on commencement day. Colonel Ingersoll recently lectured in Troy, and one-half the house was sold within two hours after the tickets were ready. His subject was, "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child."

In California's senate Mr. Wilson has moved to amend the state constitution so that no chaplain can officiate in the legislature or any state institution. Freethought is requested by a Sacramento clergyman to say that "this is not an attack by Infidels on Christianity, but that it is offered and advocated by a professed minister of the gospel," which that paper thinks is a sign of a quickened conscience.

Elsewhere the activity of the Roman Catholics in Canadian politics is described, but the item was hardly written before dispatches from Albany described also the defeat of an excise bill because of opposition from Catholic priests. The bill was not a particularly sensible measure, but the fact that a few priests can control Tammany Hall politicians to the extent of defeating a pet scheme of Tammany Hall liquor-dealers is decidedly significant.

The Interior department alleges that the army is not fit to hav the management of the Indians because some of the soldiers will drink whisky—when they can get it; and they are not averse to the seductiv game of poker, and when an impenitent mule lays its ears back and refuses to budge the soldiers will occasionally exhort the animal in language not strictly appropriate to a Sunday-school or a prayer-meeting. All this is of course very lamentable, says the Herald, but it is very doubtful whether one of these bad soldiers would make the Indians "half as wicked as would the example of an 'unco guid' hypocrit who would rob them under the cloak of humanity and starve them in the name of religion."

The attempt to pass a Sunday law in California has probably failed for the present, owing to the opposition of the Liberals of the state. The scene in the senate chamber, after the Rev. Mr. Thompson had opened the debate, is thus described in poetic measure by George E. Macdonald:

"There was quiet for an instant—you could hear a creeping mouse—
And then a shortish man arose near the middle of the house,
Who said he was an Infidel, from Infidels he came,
That he represented Infidels, and Putnam was his name."

The remainder of the poem is as bad as this, but it relates that when Putnam got warmed up the clerical crowd wasn't in it, and that the committee declined to report their bill.

In a letter to the Sun "Private" Dalzell tells of an interview had with General Sherman in which the general expressed his opinion of several of the generals of the army. Private Dalzell asked: "'And of Howard: how about that Freedman's Bureau scandal?' With a grim smile: 'Howard is a soldier, every inch of him. His glance is not comprehensiv or quick, but he is a very safe commander in the field. Personally he is honest to a fault. I know he is blameless in the Freedman's Bureau matter, and a poor man to-day. Why, but the other day I had to lend him money enough to reach the command to which I assigned him at Omaha. It was his religion that got him into all his trouble. Those religious fellows did all the stealing and let the blame fall upon Howard. Why, just let a fellow with a white necktie and a Testament under his arm approach Howard and he would never suspect him of being a thief.' At this the general laughed grimly."

As a specimen of the reasoning of those Sabbatarians who are making so much trouble all over the country we extract the following paragraphs from a letter of Rev. William Weir, district secretary of the National Reform Association, to the Christian Statesman:

"Christ, the Universal King, is the primary source of the laws of the state."

"His moral law is the standard for the laws of the state."

"The American state is bound to make and enforce only such laws as Christ the King approves."

"Every citizen is bound in conscience toward God, as well as by fear of consequences, to obey from the heart every such law."

"Every law of the state contrary to the Moral Law being contrary to the state's primary Constitution is in the highest sense unconstitutional."

"No citizen opposed to the Moral law is qualified to make the laws of the state, since he rejects the primary Constitution of the state."

These sentiments are not those of a religious lunatic, but of an organization whose power is felt in nearly every legislativ body in the country, from Congress up to a city council.

In an interview with a Herald reporter last week in relation to Sunday opening of the Metropolitan Museum of Art one of the trustees said: "There are trustees who hav been going deep down into their pockets for many years to support the Museum. They kept on giving, giving, and giving when the public did not care a straw about the institution." As a matter of cold fact the public of New York were hardly aware of the existence of the Museum before the secretary of the Secular Union (Mr. S. P. Putnam) and the Editor of The Truth Seeker circulated the petition for Sunday opening. The trustees had gotten their appropriations in a very quiet way, through the efforts of a gentleman versed in politics, had expended them as though they were private funds, and had in every way managed the Museum as they would their own private property. The agitation brought the Museum into prominence, and it is safe to say the attendance has since quadrupled. Instead of deserving consideration, as the trustee thinks, the fellows who kept the museum as a private art gallery deserve execration. But when they die the people may possibly be allowed to enter on Sunday public buildings for which they hav been taxed hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In his speech in support of the bill removing the legal disabilities of Roman Catholics to the offices of viceroy of Ireland and lord chancellor of England, Mr. Gladstone said: "A distinguished man and admirable member of this house was laid yesterday in his mother earth. He was the subject of a long controversy in this house—a controversy the beginning of which we recall and the ending of which we recollect. We remember with what zeal it was prosecuted; we remember how summarily it was dropped; we remember, also, what reparation has been done within the last few days to the distinguished man who was the immediate object of that controversy. But does anybody who hears me believe that that controversy, so prosecuted and so abandoned, was beneficial to the Christian religion? The people of this country saw through the imposture which blinded many members of this house, and it is in the name even of that religion which the vast bulk of us believe to be holy, believe to be the greatest and only true treasurer of mankind—it is in that name—if I must fall back upon such a resource—although it is mainly and broadly on the grounds which we are here to discuss, namely, the grounds of constitutional law and political wisdom—that I ask you to giv your assent to the second reading of this bill." That was a fine tribute to pay to Mr. Bradlaugh.

A so-called new "Freedom of Worship" bill has been introduced in the legislature of New York by Senator Emerson. Colonel George Bliss is the drawer of the proposed law, which aims to prevent the diversion of public money to the support of institutions unless some form of Catholic worship is permitted in those institutions. The bill reads: "It shall not be lawful for any officer of the state to pay to or for any incorporation, institution, society, or association nor to managers, agents, or officers thereof, any moneys of the state whatever, unless the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference as guaranteed by the third section of Article I of the constitution of the state is in good faith allowed to all inmates of such institutions or beneficiaries." The governor and controler may prescribe rules to ascertain whether the provisions of this act are complied with in and by the managers of such institutions to which appropriations of moneys by the state hav been made. It also says that any taxpayer may apply to the attorney-general to take measures to prevent the payment of any funds of the state in violation of the act. The act applies to all appropriations made this year, and the primary design is to enable the Roman church to set up its paraphernalia of worship in the House of Refuge on Randall's Island, which is now controled by the Protestants. Tammany Hall will of course vote for it, but the Protestants from the country districts of the state will undoubtedly defeat it.

The Roman Catholic church in Canada has gone activly into politics and will probably control the next election. It is needless to say that her influence goes to the conservativ party. Archbishop Fabre, at Montreal, has instructed Catholics to vote for the candidates of that party, and the clergy throughout the province of Quebec are now openly opposing the Liberal party. The archbishop's letter to the clergy says: "Beneath the British flag, which protects rather than dominates, we enjoy the most precious liberty, sanctioned by solemn treaties, and which preserves to us intact our laws, our institutions, our language, and, above all, our religion. You hav been able to possess these favors up to the present time, thanks to the action of divine providence, which guides our people; thanks also to the power which freely accorded these liberties in return for those sentiments and acts of perfect loyalty which you hav never ceased to offer upon each and every occasion. May we and our very dear brethren remain faithful to our traditions and to our duties in this respect in order that our country may not be exposed to the loss of that which is favorable to her and that which brings upon us the admiration of the people of other countries." In the country districts the priests are forbidding their people to vote for the liberals on pain of the church's displeasure, which means a refusal of the "sacraments" and excommunication. The liberal press has taken this letter as a text for criticism of the church, and the archbishop has been roundly abused for his interference. One liberal candidate wrote him asking if he meant what he said, and received an evasiv reply, which closed as follows: "It would be most desirable that the press should take it as a rule not to discuss episcopal documents, but to content itself with publishing them textually." Which means that the church does not propose to hav her methods criticised! The arrogance of Roman Catholicism seems unbounded.

One of Colonel Ingersoll's characteristic deeds of big-hearted generosity was performed on his recent trip to Montana to conduct a law case. It was a benefit lecture for two little girls made orphans under peculiarly pathetic circumstances. Ex-Speaker Witter of the Montana legislature was suddenly summoned home by the illness of his wife, but arrived only to find her dead. On the train he himself was stricken with pneumonia symptoms, and within two days was laid beside his wife. He was that rare personage, an honest politician, and in his pockets were found just seventy-five cents. His estate corresponded with his cash. Two girls, aged six and seven, were thus left to the charity of the people, and the ex-speaker's friends, some of Montana's noblest men, started a fund for their maintenance. It was while this was being raised that Colonel Ingersoll was called to Helena. The fund was brought to his notice by Hon. J. K Clark and H. L. Frank, who intimated that a lecture by him would swell the fund, and that they could afford to pay him handsomely besides. In five minutes the colonel consented to lecture, declined all compensation, and bought a lot of tickets for his immediate friends. The owner of the Opera House, John Maguire, gave the use of the building, and on Friday night, February 6 h, Colonel Ingersoll lectured on Shakspere. The receipts were $1.165, making the colonel's donation to the orphan children about one third of the total amount raised. The people of Helena are enthusiastic over the splendid act, and if they could elect a president of these United States, Mr. Harrison would be ousted to-morrow. The papers of the city commend Colonel Ingersoll in warm words, and the orthodox journals of the state will do well not to say anything against him just now. The lecture was the one he will deliver for the Press Club in this city on March 23 l, when our readers will be made acquainted with some of its beauties. Shakspere has been of great benefit to the world, but there are two little girls in Montana who will undoubtedly feel more than ordinarily grateful to him all their lives. And it is pleasant to know that Colonel Ingersoll's many humane deeds are being appreciated by others than his personal friends. The Troy Budget says of this latest public benefaction: "A Western paper expresses surprise because Colonel 'Bob' Ingersoll lectured for a charitable purpose in Helena, and not only refused to accept a cent for his services, but in addition bought a number of tickets of admission. They evidently don't know the eloquent Infidel very well out West. His heart is always a good deal bigger than his pocket." And its neighbor, the Saratogian, adds, "Who doubts but that those tickets will help 'Bob' to admission somewhere else some day?"

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Feb. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The city council of Salina was waited upon by a ministerial committee, composed of Rev. F. D. Baker, Rev. C. P. Chittenden, et al, praying for the repression of a periodical called the Kansas City Sunday Sun, and the idea struck the mayor, C. R. Underwood, so forcibly that he urged its carrying out, and so they forbid the selling of it upon the streets of Salina. But not long since, one of the former presidents of the Young Men's Christian Association it is presumed went where all the "goody-goody" young men go, i e., to Canada, and it is estimated that he took with him $20,000 belonging to other parties, and all the ministers and the papers of Salina that had anything to say upon the subject had nothing but the kindest words of praise to offer in regard to their very nice young man. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

MEMPHIS, TENN., Feb. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a clipping out of the Commercial of this city, which, though not of late date, perhaps would be interesting to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and perhaps useful to some Christian brute who wants scripture authority for beating his wife. It is a pity that the book and verse are not given, but Mr. Leiber may be willing to accommodate his pious confrères by quoting the passage in the "Holy Bible"—or rather, Holy Bosh.

FORT WORTH, TEX., June 6.—Henry Leiber, aged thirty-three, has a wife of fourteen, obtained from her father on a contract that she was not to be worked in the field. Henry is a well-to-do planter, and claims the divine right to beat his wife whenever he sees fit, quoting his authority from the Bible. Whenever Henry's food was not cooked to suit him he thrashed his wife. Yesterday he ordered her to go to the cotton field with his negroes. She refused to go and he beat her. She returned to her father's and to-day filed suit for divorce.

Yours truly, J. WILTON.

MT. VERNON, ONT., Feb. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: So much pleased am I with the paper and pictures that I write these lines to encourage you in your good work. I get my paper from the news-agent of Brantford. He also got me the "Text-Book," which just suits me. All who handle the book hav to, and can, read the pictures, whether they want to or not. I want you to send me your catalog of publications, as I want some more of your books and pamphlets. Being a farmer, I don't feel the evil effects of outspoken Infidelity as much as some others. I used to take Secular Thought, but economy compelled me to drop one Liberal paper, so I chose THE TRUTH SEEKER. The pictures settled the case for me. I wanted them for the children and myself. I occasionally send copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to friends and relativs, and some write that they intend subscribing for the paper.

We are on the eve of a general election. Both political parties are hopelessly tied to the tail of the Catholic church. Of the two, the Reform party is the most truculent and subservient, and has sold itself body and soul to the pope. In this country the Catholic church holds a party in each hand, and at election time the political cow which will giv the most and richest milk is the one the church supports. At present the United States can hav no sensible use for Canada, and we hav no use for ourselvs in a progressiv and liberal sense. No doubt this country will become a sort of Spain in North America. JAS. S. PALMER.

KENT, IA., Feb. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER came to hand a few days ago, and a more happy man would be hard to find just on the strength of it. I am happy to think that I hav a term paid in advance for such a help to enjoyment of the time and such an educator. Well, language fails me to express my high approval of the paper. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER eight or nine years, and I am going to tell you that it has helped me in every way. I feel that I am a better man in every way. It has brought me to a sense of duty. I am made to love and respect my family and treat my wife better; though I always had a high ambition to do that which was right, and to provide all things honest in the sight of men—not God, for I never thought he cared a snap whether I was honest or not. I hav thought many times that I ought to get up and tell my sweet experience, so take the present opportunity. I belonged to the church for eight years. I prayed, I sang, I washed the saints' dirty feet, and was baptized by triune baptism, so I was pushed under once in the name of the Father, once in the name of the Son, once in the name of the Holy Ghost. And I did many more things which space here excludes. Now, dear brother and sister Infidels, can you say that I had no faith? Yes, bless you, I had even more faith than that, but will not tell. Now, how do you think I became enlightened so wonderfully now? Why, just one little peep at the noble TRUTH SEEKER, and I mustered up all the common sense that I had left; that is how. So I will hav THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as my dollars last. Then, it is so cheap; what is $3 for the amount of news it brings weekly? The only advice I wish to make is, keep that mighty Heston at work. GEO. W. KEIM.

PELLA, IA., Feb. 13, 291.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but my father is a devout believer in "truth and justice to all with malice to none," as well as a subscriber to your valuable paper, and to do him justice and speak a work of encouragement to the few, out of so many, that are trying to do that which is right in the way of enlightening the world, I thought I would write a few lines on the subject of religion. I am not a believer in the divinity of Christ, nor do I believe that the world was created in six days. It seems strange to me how any man with a "spoonful of brains in the back part of his orthodox head" can, after reading the holy word, believe such a mixed-up mess of stuff as that which it contains. When God created the universe, why did he not make all things to harmonize with each other? For instance, if he wished his beloved children to enter the kingdom of heaven, why did he place temptation before them and then prepare a place of eternal damnation for them if they should allow themselvs to be tempted by that which the "all-merciful God" set before them? If God foreknew all things, he must hav known that his children would sin, and why did he not nip the thing in the bud, and that would hav settled all future contests between good and evil and there would hav been no need of a Satan or purgatory?

The day is fast approaching when people will become wiser, and when we shall hav no more prayers and Bible readings in our public schools, and when the churches will become lecture halls and opera houses and theaters, and public money will be paid out where it will be most beneficial to the majority of people, instead of paying it out to support a few aristocrat know-nothing sky-pilots that do nothing in the way of enlightening the people, but simply stand up in the pulpit and put on airs and tell the same story over and over until the members become completely disgusted and weary of listening to them and finally drop out one by one until there are not enough of them left to form a quorum (that is, the required two or three) to claim the divine favor, consequently when the hour of death draws near they become almost raving maniacs through the fear of an endless hell. Such is the goodness and mercy of God.

Yours for Freethought, MRS. C. B. H.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Feb. 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When I read Bradlaugh was dead, I was filled with deepest emotion and cried like a child, for to me he was a friend and brother in the broadest, highest sense. I hav ever marked his noble, high, triumphant career with the greatest interest and approval, and I wish to giv public appreciation of his great worth and service to humanity, because his early life, in his struggles to obtain knowledge; his toils, hardships, and opposition; his resistance to false doctrins and legal and conventional tyranny and the suppression of his irresistible self-hood and manhood, were in many respects like my own, with far more power to endure and resist. He was near and dear to me. He was one of the few great and good men that appear on earth to teach us the possibilities of the future of man when humanity, truth, liberty, and manhood shall lead and dominate the world. His body, face, and towering, symmetrical head tell his character and capacity, the aspirations, the scope, and altitude of his great mind. Like me, he was a Materialist—everybody is, if he or she knew it. He was a godless man, an Atheist. He had to be; his clear and discerning mind brought him to it, and he saw at once that he could "not serve God and" humanity, that Gods must die that humanity may liv and make the most of life, and earth in time be the abode of health, joy, peace, and plenty. He taught by precept and example what an Atheist can do and be, however much the Atheist has been and yet is belied and disparaged by orthodox and Spiritualists, for want of belief in what to him is absurd and impossible. But our mental and moral Hercules the invisible is prematurely laid low. But he is immortal in the never-dying fragrance and effulgence of his glorious life and career. Like Paine, his worth and power will be more and more felt, recognized, and applauded as we grow onward and upward toward the light of a higher life. Even his Parliamentary opponents will more or less relent and regret their unjust and unmanly treatment. What a grief, what a loss, to Annie Besant, his coadjutor and defender! What a loss to all who love truth and humanity! I had hoped he would liv twenty years more to see and reap the reward of his great services to man. What an irreparable blank he has left, for there is but one Bradlaugh. Blessed and sacred is his memory to me.

The faithful muse shall tell the world thy fame,
And unborn realms resound thy praise again.

NATIONAL HOME, WIS., Feb. 10, A.S. 291.

MR. EDITOR: How vividly we remember the most trivial events of our boyhood days. Away back in the dreary winter of 1836-7, in the town of Maryland, N. Y., there appeared, like the ill-omened star of Bethlehem, one Benum, Brother Benum he was called by the God-afflicted sisters of his church; but alas for these dear, deluded sisters! for he proved anything than a brother.

Now, although he enjoyed a remarkably "soft snap" through all that long, rigorous winter, his devilish designs, amorous intrigues, and sanctimonious villainy seemed to know no bounds; and while the whole neighborhood was ablaze with scandal, yet he never lost an opportunity to preach his regular sermon on Sunday, and every night in the week he kept them on their knees and bathed in tears, while their shrieks and groans shook the rafters of some farmer's house in the neighborhood; and thus he held them down until the spring in spite of the good advice they had received from one or two sensible skeptics. He had at length, however, become so reckless that he was (as near as it ever can happen) caught in the act of adultery; that is, the woman was caught, not the man, for man cannot commit this heinous offense, oh, no! but woman only, vile, wretched woman! For the truth of this assertion I refer you to the holy scriptures, where a woman was caught in the very act of adultery and dragged before God's youngest son for trial. Now, in this most remarkable suit, before the highest tribunal on earth or in heaven, there was no mention of any man in this most horrible crime, which was punishable by stoning to death.

Nevertheless, Brother Benum's career seemed drawing speedily to a close, in our settlement at least. Now, these horny-handed farmers assembled late one night to talk about the weather and things, while Benum, nearly used up, had fallen asleep. One thought he had smelt a rat or something for a long time. Hereupon the rest thought so too, and all began to wax hostil, and in their kindling fury dragged this candle of the Lord before their rustic church committee; they thought they had him at last, for he looked so repentant. Ah, me! how little they knew the man! For Benum, being deeply impressed with his religious duties, and feeling the great necessity of opening everything with prayer, fell at once upon his knees and fervently besought God to put some sense into the heads of this deluded and much befogged committee, and after reminding God that they were fools and asses, he waited not for their customary amen, but sprang like an enraged lion to his feet and with glaring orbs faced this awe-stricken and half-paralyzed committee. He scored them for all their faults, follies, sins, and above all their consummate ignorance and babyish imbecility. "Think you," he thundered, "that your women are, or ever were, virtuous? I tell you, no! For there is no such thing as virtue on God's green orb among women; and as regards yours, I will name to your faces at least a dozen of them that I myself——" At this stage the committee groaned; but the inspired scoundrel held them down until he had told his disgusting story, to the everlasting shame of, doubtless, many respectable women of our God-crazed neighborhood. Now, there was not a man among these stalwart rustics who could not easily hav doubled Benum up and consigned him to the flames in the stove; but they didn't. Why? Because they were as helpless in his presence as a nest of young mice under a lion's paw.

I hav not the slightest doubt but Benum hypnotized our whole neighborhood, and had it not been for outside influences over which he could hav little or no control, he would hav been as safe in his most damnable practices there for any length of time as Schweinfurth, or Lazarus in Abraham's bosom.

But this almost lifeless committee, after confessing their shortcomings to Benum, declared that they had serious doubts about most women-folks; but begged that "dear Brother Benum" would withdraw from their midst for a season, at least. He would for a bonus. He got it, mounted his pony, and rode prayerfully away, while the committee wept. Yours truly, NELSON HUNT.

CAPRON, ILL., Feb. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Another pioneer Freethinker has gone to his rest. On the 13th of February, 1891, Danforth Nettleton, prostrated by disease and age, passed away at Belvidere, Boone county, Ill. He was buried on Sunday, the 15th, in the Long Prairie cemetery in the town of Leroy, Boone county. He has been a stanch Freethinker for many years; has been a sincere friend and patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Freethought cause; was always ready and anxious to work for its advancement. He made special request that no representativ of any church was to conduct his burial service, but that his Freethinking friends should perform that service; consequently the last rites and ceremonies of burial of this venerable father were conducted according to his wishes.

The following address was delivered at the grave by W. Fox. A FRIEND.

Friends and Neighbors: Before us stands the monument dedicated to the memory of our friend and neighbor, Danforth Nettleton, and his family. Some years ago he anticipated this event, and caused it to be erected, and inscribed upon it what he desired to publicly proclaim—that he was a Freethinker, such he lived and such he died. He further provided for this event by choosing friends in sympathy with his line of thought to conduct the service at the grave. And in taking a retrospectiv view of his life it shall be my desire to answer his request truly.

Our friend and neighbor had reached a ripe old age, and life's care and suffering had become quite burdensome to him at times, and for some time past he frequently expressed a desire to cast off life's burdens. "But Mother Nature ushers us into this world without our consent or knowledge; nature forces us out, with the same disregard for our wishes or feelings. We enter in perfect helplessness and ignorance; we retire with but faint perceptions of universal knowledge." Could we hav the choice between individual life and nonexistence, many there are who would welcome the latter. Many poor, struggling human beings hav been cursed with life, cursed with the inheritance of feeble bodies or impure minds, and are hampered and hedged in on all sides by misery and misfortune. No amount of effort could make their lives more than passably endurable. Others are born into an atmosphere of peace and healthfulness, where they are upheld in usefulness and purity by the mere force of circumstances. So secure are they, so guarded, that scarcely anything in the form of temptation can reach them. They are good of necessity. It is clearly the duty of every rational being to do as much good and as little evil as possible; and if we only impose upon ourselvs the conditions we thrust upon others our standard will be high enough. Knowing, as we do, how grudgingly Nature bestows her gifts upon some and how lavishly upon others, why should we praise or censure each other so loudly? Between us and the inner life of everyone a vell is drawn; and we can comprehend but little of the internal emotions or secret motivs. There is some good in all. Let us then endeavor to cultivate a sympathy so true, a helpfulness so great, a charity so broad, that it may embrace humanity; and crowd out all evil from our own hearts. When, as to-day, we look upon the lifeless form of a friend, let us reflect upon these facts. Let us remember that we know not how often those closed eyes hav looked through clouds of trouble for rays of hope, those silent lips uttered warm appeals which were unheeded, those folded hands scattered blessings which yet liv.

While we regret his loss, and miss him from our daily lives, we will not harrow up our hearts with vain regrets or fruitless fears. A true and noble man, he made of life the best he could. No fear of God, no thought of future punishment or reward, controled his acts. His mind was free from superstition, and his sense of right and justice was the law he obeyed.

His early life was one of ceaseless struggle and toil, with few opportunities for mental culture. He came to this part of the country in an early day, with nothing in hand, to build for himself and family a home out of the unbroken soil of this neighborhood; and by honest industry, persevering toil, privations, and hardships, he succeeded.

In his latter years he was quite an extensiv reader and independent thinker, on the problems of the life forces in the realms of Mother Nature. Nature and nature's laws were his constant theme of study and thought, and his conclusions, as he frequently stated, were that when man's organism broke down through disease or age to death, the functions of the brain ceased, the individual identity mingled with the elements of nature, and the man was at rest.

His work well done, let him rest in peace, and leave for us his good example and his honored memory.

And while we giv to Mother Nature that which is her own, we bury all that's left us of this friend, and say, regretfully, our last farewell.

MR. EDITOR: "God is angry with the wicked every day" (Psalms vii, 11). "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools" (Eccles. vii, 9). If the Bible writers called their God a fool, were they better than fetich-worshipers? Can Christians blame us for not getting down on our knees to an almighty fool "up dar in de sky?" How much inspiration did the prophets and seers need to hav in order to call God a fool? Will some reverend please inform us?

If God wrote the first chapter of Genesis, he is just what David and Solomon say that he is. In describing the work which Jehovah did on the third day of creation, the account reads as follows: "And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear; and it was so. And God called the dry land earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he seas; and God saw that it was good. And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth; and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind; and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day" (Gen. i, 9-13). Now, I will let any impartial judge decide as to whether this passage does not explicitly declare that all land vegetation was created on the third day. What else can it mean? Yet we are told in the succeeding verses that on the fourth day God created the sun, without which no vegetation can exist or grow, as well as the moon, stars, and other planets. But all geologists, so far as I hav been able to discover, teach that, as regards our solar system, the sun, Neptune, Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars were all in existence millions of years before the earth had a separate form; and that the moon itself must hav existed for ages before any land vegetation could hav grown on the surface of the earth. Did this God know what he was talking about when he inspired Moses to write such nonsense? Was not Solomon correct in observing that God was a fool?

Again, we read in the twentieth and succeeding verses concerning what God did on the fifth day. We find that on that day he said, "Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life;" and that on that same fifth day of creation God created "every living thing that moveth, which the waters brought forth." Now, if this does not mean that God created all the fish and other inhabitants of earth's waters on the fifth day of creation, what does it mean? If it means anything else, then black may mean white and white may mean black whenever found in the Bible.

Theologians, and theological school-teachers who teach geology, assert that the days of Genesis mean vast geological periods. But will any self-respecting geologist dare to assert that two of these vast periods elapsed between the beginnings of land vegetation and the commencement of marine animal life, and that the former preceded the latter? Is it not well known to the most superficial student of geological science that, millions of years before any of our present land vegetation existed, saurians of huge size and fantastic forms had plowed the surface of the mighty deep and fishes innumerable sported amid its briny waters? Is it not a well-known fact that life on this planet did not commence, as Genesis asserts, on the land, but in the ocean? Has it not been conclusivly shown by an investigation of those rocks lying immediately above the metamorphic, that land vegetation did not, as Genesis declares, antedate life in the ocean by two vast geologic periods? Says Wm. Denton: "Life did not commence on the land; for the land surface of the globe was a wilderness of bare and heated rock; and life upon it was an impossibility. The first fossils we find giv us reason to believe that life commenced in very simple forms, and in the ocean" (Lectures on Geology, p. 76).

So it appears that the scheme of stretching the days of creation into vast millennia does not succeed in getting the theologians out of their dilemma. Before geology had been placed upon a solid basis, theologians were unanimous in declaring that to put any other meaning upon the word "day" than twenty-four hours would be destructiv to biblical exegesis. Watson, author of the "Institutes," a standard work in the regular course of study of Methodist ministers, says it is not safe to attempt to change the signification of the word, because to do so is to destroy the foundation of the Sabbath. How does it happen that the clergy are now so vigorously advocating a Sabbath or Sunday law, when their own interpretation of biblical geology undermines the very foundations of their holy day? Is it because their creed is in most danger at that point? If so, let the war go on. Theology will just as surely be compelled to yield this point as it did others, such as the flatness of the earth's surface and the earth as the stable center of the universe. The time is now ripe for the utter annihilation of the Sabbatarian pretensions of the church, and this point should be emphasized.

What a foolish God indeed, who knew no better than to plant his fourth Commandment on those unscientific and nonsensical statements of Genesis, which are no longer credited save by those over whose intellectual horizon the densest ignorance prevails!

MAKANDA, ILL., Feb. 4, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I see that my article with regard to the Brotherhood of Moralists is thought by Miss Ella E. Gibson to be misleading. I am sorry that one so candid and intelligent as she is should think so. I certainly did not intend it should be so. Several friends whom I respected had urged me to join the order, and my aim was to plainly, candidly, and briefly giv some of the reasons why I could not comply with their request. Miss Gibson says, "There is no imputation that Garrison and his peers would be excluded from membership," and givs as a reason, "because they were good, pure men." Then, further on she says, "A believer in the phenomena called Spiritualism, as caused by spirits, could not belong to such an organization." In view of the fact that Garrison was such a believer I cannot harmonize the statements. Then she adds, "Why should he desire to be a member?" I do not know why? I incline to think he does not so desire. It is too much like joining the church. The church claims to be preëminently a moral organization, yet, like the Brotherhood of Moralists, a pure moral character in the applicant is not sufficient to secure membership—he must subscribe to a creed. If, as in the case I mentioned in my former communication, he sees a chair move over the floor in apparently intelligent response to questions both oral and mental, and is asked for the cause of it, he may attribute it to hypnotism, electricity, jugglery, or any other such cause, no matter how foolish or absurd, and he can still be a good member of the order; but if, like thousands of others of our purest citizens, he thinks the most rational solution of the phenomena is to attribute them to spirit agency, and is honest enough to say so, he is unworthy of membership. This exclusivness, I think, cripples the order and hinders its usefulness. It tends to widen a breach among the genuin friends of reform that ought to be, I think must be, closed up before we can succeed in the rescue of our imperiled liberties for which we are all laboring. In this crisis of our fate, when confronted by an organized, wily, and powerful foe, who has sworn to crush out our liberties, why should we demand of the honest ally who offers to help fight freedom's battle, that first he must say our shibboleth. Why should we exclude him from our ranks because in some minor details "he followeth not with us?" I am equally ready to coöperate with the honest and earnest workers of either party. When I wrote my former article I did not expect to further discuss the subject, but Brother Wettstein, after making some very remarkable statements, and asking some questions which he seems to think will be difficult and which he asks me to answer, says, "I pause for a reply. Will it be forthcoming?" Yes, sir, I will answer. But first let me thank you for the kind and appreciativ words you were pleased to write with regard to the spirit of my former article. You call the belief in the after life an "heirloom of ancient ignorance and superstition." Is not that begging the very question in dispute and assuming to settle it by assertion without proof? If in the end Spiritualism is proved to be true, as I hope it will, it will then be found that the ignorance is on the other side of the question. As to superstition, I think it an improper term as applied to Spiritualism. If Spiritualism is true, then a faith in it is simply a belief of facts, which never can be superstition, and if it is not true, Spiritualists are mistaken as to the evidence, that is all, and there is not necessarily any superstition about it. It is easy for either party in a controversy to call the other ignorant, superstitious, etc., if they are so minded, but it proves nothing and does no good. You ask: "What if it can be mathematically demonstrated that human souls hav been already evolved from this planet in such numbers—provided always that any hav been evolved at all—that they extend in a compact mass far beyond our sun in every radial direction, . . . and all this in a few thousand years?" Why, my dear friend, if you can demonstrate all that it would be awful. When I read it I almost felt a sense of suffocation, and, as the Irishman said, I wanted a "gasp of fresh air." An old lady, after reading your letter, said it gave her the "horrors." It would put me in a terrible fix if life continues—an old man, the sands of whose life are nearly run out, just about to make my bow and depart, to hav it demonstrated that as soon as I did so I would find myself in the center of an enormous globe, 200,000,000 miles in diameter, composed of a "compact mass of spirits," on top of each other like pickled herrings, and no "room to flap my wings in!" Why, it would be as bad as the orthodox hell. I don't wonder that, with such a faith, you hate and oppose the doctrin of immortality. Annihilation would be infinitly preferable to such a fate. But I can scarcely think that one so intelligent as you are can really believe such statements demonstrably true. If so, I wish you had given the "demonstration"—the "indisputable figures, data, and statistics" you tell us to "wait for." Now, though I never studied arithmetic a day in school in my life, I propose to use a few "figures," and, if possible, see what they do demonstrate on this question.

To get fairly and intelligently started, let us assume that the "few thousand years" you speak of, during which our race has existed on this earth, amount to 200,000 years, and that the average number of inhabitants of each generation was two billions, and that one generation passed away every twenty years—which are very liberal estimates. This would giv us an aggregate population, up to date, of 20 trillions of souls. By allowing a small fraction less than four square feet to each person, they could all stand on the territory of the United States. At the same estimate, it would require 14 millions of years to fill up all the standing-room on a planet like our earth—say 8,000 miles in diameter. Yet you say that in the "few thousand years" that our earth has been engaged in the business "enough souls hav been evolved, provided any hav, to extend in a compact mass far beyond our sun in every radial direction" (if you please, let us stop at, and call it, 100,000,000 miles)! That is to say, the spirits evolved from our planet in that comparativly short period would form a globe of spirits, in "compact mass," 200,000,000 miles in diameter, or 15,625 billions of times the bulk of the planet that produced them! You certainly do not mean, in earnest, to say that the truth of a proposition, or statement, so infinitly unreasonable and preposterous, can be established by "mathematical demonstration." Let us suppose that the sun and all the planets in our system were now to commence their period of evolution of spirits, and that they should each produce them, in proportion to their bulk, as rapidly as we hav supposed the earth to do. In one million of years our earth would evolve one hundred trillions, the sun 1,400,000 times as many as the earth, Jupiter 1,200 and Saturn 1,000 times as many as our earth, etc. (This is more than fair, for although the sun is 1,400,000 times larger than our earth, it is only 350,000 times heavier; it, Jupiter, and Uranus being, "bulk for bulk," only one-fourth the weight of our planet, and Saturn and Neptune only one-sixth.) At this rate of production, our entire solar system would evolve a fraction less than 141 quintillions in one million years, and allowing twelve cubic feet to each person, and calling our globe 8,000 miles in diameter, it would require our entire system over 23,000,000 years to form a planet the size of ours. Now, if these hasty calculations are correct, or even approximately correct, you made a frightful draft on your imagination when you penned your letter.

You farther state that it can be "mathematically demonstrated" that when the sun and all the planets arrive at their soul-producing period (if they ever do), they will evolve not only souls enough to fill all the space belonging to the solar system but enough to encroach on and occupy the domain of several adjoining planetary systems! It is very difficult, if not impossible, for the human mind to gain any clear idea of the vastness of the space belonging to the domain of our solar system. Let us try to get a little idea of it.

Down low in the southern hemisphere, in the beautiful constellation Centaur, is a bright star called Alpha Centauri, which, astronomers tell us, is the nearest fixed star in the heaven, being twenty trillions of miles distant. In the northern hemisphere, in the constellation of the Swan, the star called 61 Cygni is ascertained to be about three times as distant, or sixty trillions of miles. No stars in any other direction are nearer than these. Our system, then, moves in a region of otherwise unoccupied space at least eighty trillions of miles in diameter, a fair division of which would giv it the control of a vast globe of space forty trillions of miles in diameter. Now let us suppose the plane of our horizon extended in every horizontal direction till it reaches the boundary of our system, "where gravitation shifting turns the other way," and we hav a plane forty trillions of miles in diameter, containing more than one and one-fourth octillions of square miles. Now, take the soul-product of the entire solar system for one million of years, and this plane will afford each one of them an area of over 8,900,000 square miles. Or, to state it differently, it would require our entire system to evolve souls more than 8,900,000,000,000 years to furnish one soul for every square mile of that plane! Then, if that immense globe of space were cut into planes parallel to the first, and one million miles apart, there would be forty million planes. In view of all which, it would seem that our believers in immortality need entertain no serious apprehension of being badly crowded for a while yet!

So far we hav gone on the supposition that the globes forming our system were evolving souls continuously, but such is not the fact. Of the higher forms or grades of mind, they seem shy producers. Our planet existed hundreds of millions of years, perhaps, before it evolved a single rational being, and it will probably continue to revolve, a dead world, millions of years after it has ceased to produce them. And it is probable that neither the sun, nor any one of the planets but our earth, has in all the untold millions of years that it has existed produced a single one.

But, Brother Wettstein argues, if spirits are produced at all, they will be eternally produced, and must of necessity ultimately fill up all space. This conclusion is, I think, incorrect. It is a self-evident proposition that if you continue to giv, without any equivalent being returned, the supply will ultimately be exhausted. If the earth furnishes the material from which spirits are evolved, and none of it is returned, the supply will be exhausted, and the production cease, as certainly as it would were it any grosser product.

It will be inferred that I am a believer in immortality. On that subject also I am an Agnostic. I really know nothing about it. As a rule, there is a beginning and an end to all organisms. There are, however, sometimes radical changes in the manner, form, and conditions of life. We see the locusts, after groveling seventeen years in the dirt and darkness, leave that form of life, and, like the cabbage worm, caterpillar, etc., become an activ, winged insect, and, with apparently much improved faculties and capacity for enjoyment, revel for a time, in apparently unalloyed happiness, in the pure air and bright sunshine of heaven. But in the end it dies. It may be that, with continued life, a far more glorious transformation awaits humanity. I hope so. But, if it does, it also may end. We may theorize about immortality, or settle it in the usual way of the church, by authority, but I see no way of determining it, but by experience, and I know of no one who has lived long enough to do it.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Ditty of Chicago.

The city of Chicago she sitteth by the Lake,
And a very great and mighty town is she;
There are sights to see in plenty, and there's money for to make
In divers ways, as we shall shortly see.

And in this famous city dwelt a very pious man,
And he stood alone communing with himself;
His hands down in his pockets to the elbows he did jam,
But he found a doleful scarcity of pelf.

"Ah!" quoth this pious gentleman, "my pockets they are lank,
But I hav a scheme to fill them up again;
The way I mean to do it is to start a savings bank,
And the course that I shall follow's very plain.

"I'll start my banking business on a most religious plan,
I'll open every morning with a prayer,
And ere we close at evening I will warble forth a psalm,
And I'll place a Bible near my office chair."

So he started up the business in a very dandy way,
And practiced his religious rites apace;
And he always went to meeting upon the Sabbath day,
And in the "Amen corner" took his place.

And the saints came flocking to him with pockets full of pelf,
And poor men brought their savings to his door;
And when they saw the Bible lying on the office shelf,
They said, "We've found an honest man once more."

And a very godly woman, who hates the smell of gin,
And loathes the very name of lager beer;
And thinks a whisky cocktail the unpardonable sin,
And that even cider is a thing to fear,

She brought a lot of money that she had gathered up
From many other women in the land,
To build a gorgeous "temple" with a woman on the top,
And she placed it in the "honest" banker's hand.

And when she brought it to him he was kneeling down in prayer,
And supplicating loud the throne of grace;
And with tears of meek contrition he bedewed the office chair,
And a sanctimonious odor filled the place.

And the sight was so affecting that she could not help but say,
"How beautiful a thing it was to mix
Religion up with banking in this very lovely way,
Instead of being up to sharper's tricks."

And so the banking business flourished for a little space,
And the banker raked in dollars by the score;
And the banker's breeches pockets were filling up apace,
And he said, "It's nearly time to close the door.

"But first I'll tip the wink unto the dearest of my friends,
To take their money out without delay;
The working folks hav left enough to answer all my ends,
And I may need my friends' another day."

Next day the morning papers said the savings bank was "bust,"
And everything was gone to kingdom come;
It didn't damage much the saints among the upper crust,
But the sinners in the workshop felt it some.

And one, he spake quite hotly to his fellows in the shop,
And he said, "I hope the devil gets the man
Who, just that he may squeeze us, goes in partnership with Jesus,
And hurts his fellow beings all he can."

But the very godly woman, who loathed the smell of gin,
She felt her feelings very badly hurt
That worldly-minded people should say such things of him,
And draggle his religion in the dirt.

For it was quite impossible so good a man should err,
Such a bright and shining pillar of the church.
Then the funds she had entrusted him did not belong to her,
The other women might hav differed much.

And so this pious gentleman turned out a shocking fraud,
And didn't pay a copper of his debts;
For you see he had no capital, but just the grace of God,
And that can't be accepted as assets.

And the city of Chicago still sitteth by the lake
And gazeth out across the waters proud;
But religion's at a discount, and the people fairly quake
When they strike a man who says his prayers too loud.

Planets, Suns, and Atmospheres.

TO L. L. GOODWIN: Fifty-three years an educator and ardent votary of astronomical science, I answer your questions with great inspiration and pleasure.

From all that I know, and from my own observations of the sun in eclipses, I can say it is the sun's atmosphere we see, and not the sun. If this be true, then it is true of all suns (fixed stars) and the invisible planets that revolve around them. It is very doubtful about there being any heat in the sun that comes to us.

I think heat on the surface of the earth is the result of the earth's and sun's atmospheres' coöperativ action. The result, or heat, is seen and felt on and near the earth, where the atmosphere is the most dense. The electricity, or whatever it may be that passes from the sun to the earth, produces continually increased friction as it approaches the earth, and heat is in the same proportion. We hav been taught in the text books that heat on the planets must diminish as their distance from the sun increases, and vice versa, and that the heat at Mercury must be, if my memory is right, twenty thousand times as hot as red-hot iron. We are taught that the heat and light of bodies diminish as the square of the distance increases; thus the heat and light three feet away are only one-ninth of those which are but one foot away from the body emitting them.

But this is true only in a horizontal direction, on or near the earth's surface. If we go up toward the sun, heat diminishes, so that at three miles from the earth it is freezing cold.

Again, at our coldest time in the winter we are three millions of miles nearer to the sun than in our hottest season.

I agree with you in your conceptions and analogies as to how the earth would appear to a person on the moon, the appearance of the aurora borealis, the character and functions of electricity, etc.

Probably every body in the Great All has its aerial, electric, magnetic atmosphere, both for production and protection. The human brain has its atmosphere, its halo of colors, or, if I may so speak, its cerebral solar spectrum. Clairvoyants hav often told me with great enthusiasm what a brilliant crown of colors encircled my upper brain, or head. No words can express the charming, fascinating effect colors hav upon me. The atmospheres of persons vary in character and quality as much as the persons from whom they emanate. I believe, when two persons are attracted and congenial, their atmospheres blend more or less; when two persons repel each other, their atmospheres, or spheres, collide. Perhaps there is as much difference in the atmospheres of suns and planets as in those of human beings. "Well, I think you are a pretty smart chap for a young lad of only fifty-seven, judging from your analytical, discriminativ, comprehensiv expression." I am only seventy-two, and know how little I know, which is more than everyone can say.

However wise you may be in astronomy, if you hav not read Colonel Kelso's "The Universe Analyzed," you ought to. Its conceptions, descriptions, and logic in relation to world development, gestation, growth, and decay, and that the universe, as a whole, is and appears always and forever the same, satisfies my mind far better than anything else I hav read.

How an astronomer and a true cosmologist can believe in the inhuman, absurd, pueril myths and dogmas of the God-creation humbug, is very strange to me. Most of our Freethinkers would be greatly expanded and exalted if they knew more of astronomy. I hav only barely alluded to a few points, for I need much more space than the Children's Corner can giv me. Hoping that, as we are young, we may yet grow much, I bless you and reach out my hand to shake.

PROF. J. H. COOK.

Chats with Correspondents.

E. ROUSSEAU.—Come again, and you will be welcome every time. You hit the nail on the head, as the saying is.

SADIE A. M.—Your story is on file and will come along in good time. We are as busy as busy can be, and that's the reason you do not get a nice long letter. Hope you are well and happy as you deserve to be.

JAMES B.—It does not mature very fast, that is, the project of the young people's paper that you kindly ask about. It needs capital, and lots of it, to start any kind of a smart paper, such as ours will be when it does start. We are promised brains from all parts of the world, but we need some money back of the brains.

GEO. J. R.—We call you our "right-hand man." We claim that we hav the brightest young men and young women, the darlingest little girls and little boys, in our Children's Corner, that can be found in a journey around the world.

MATTIE Y.—So you want to be a captain in the Salvation Army! That's all perfect nonsense, Mattie. Be a captain in the Liberal ranks, and scatter joy and sunshine as you go. You want to be up with the times, and not a thousand years behind them.

E. DOS SANTOS.—Your communication is received and will appear soon.

Correspondence.

BANCROFT, S. D., Feb. 8, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My uncle has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. I like the Corner very much. We go to a literary meeting every Thursday night. I read a piece out of the Corner; the title of it was, "Found Asleep." I am twelve years old. I go to school. I study the Fourth Reader, arithmetic, history, geography, spelling, and writing. I hav one brother who is nine years old; his name is James. He goes to school. I must stop for this time, and I will write some time again to the Corner. I remain,

Your Liberal friend, GRACE A. MILLER.

BROWNSVILLE, ORE., Feb. 3, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Corner. I like the Corner and the children's letters. My grandpa takes the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I always look at the pictures, and read the Corner. Grandpa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER long before I was born, and now I am eleven years old. I go to school. I am in the Fourth Reader. I study arithmetic, reading, writing, geography, and spelling. I am an orphan. I liv with my grandpa and grandma. As this is my first letter to the Corner, I hope it will not be thrown in the waste-basket. I remain,

Your friend, BLANCHE EVEREST.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 2, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am highly pleased to read the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week about the Sunday Club. Father thinks it is a capital idea, and he says he is willing for us to start a Sunday Club in our house, as he believes in the children enjoying themselvs on a Sunday. They hav school enough all the week, without having Sunday-school to attend to. I am much delighted to read the Children's Corner. This is my second letter to the Corner. It has been a year and a half since I wrote my first letter. I am keeping that and felt proud to read it to-day. I go to school every day, and will be thirteen next June. I am in the third grammar, for I was promoted to-day. I am anxious to leave school, but father says that I must learn all I can while I am young, as he thinks I am too young to go to work. I go to the Sunday meetings every Sunday with father and my sisters. We children often think that if parents would take their children to our Liberal meetings what a large gathering of children would be there. We often ask father how it is, but he says he cannot understand it. I will conclude with my love to the editor and all the children that write to the Children's Corner. ELEANOR LONGFORD.

NEW ERA, ORE., Feb. 5, 291.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try to write a few lines for the Children's Corner for the first time.

My papa and mamma are Liberals, so we children are not growing up in ignorance.

I go to school. I am fourteen years old, and study reading, history, arithmetic, physiology, geography, grammar, drawing, and spelling.

Our teacher is a young lady who is well known in the Liberal ranks. Her name is Miss Katie Kehm.

We hav a Liberal lyceum here, but we hav only a small attendance, yet we keep up courage.

We celebrated Thomas Paine's birthday here, when our president, Miss Kehm, delivered an address.

I must tell you about our bright young secretary, Miss Laura Zeek. She is a very nice reader.

We are also trying to establish a Liberal school. If we can get as much as $1,000 we will build one of the best schools on the coast.

With best wishes to you and the children,

Yours for liberty, WILLIE JESSE.

A CHARMING LETTER FROM A CHARMING LITTLE BOY.

BRUNO, S. D., Feb. 1, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Will you suffer a little orphan and a non-subscriber to appear in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER?

Pa is not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, from the fact that we are too poor to pay for it, but still we get one every week. That good man, Leonard Geiger, of Hudson, N. Y., sends us THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator every week, and I enjoy reading your Children's Corner so much. I do love to hear little Freethought children talk. I am one myself. But I am the only child Infidel I ever saw, hence I hav no little boy associates. I hav been going to school for a few weeks past, but I must stop now and go to work. Pa says he aims to start me again the 1st of July and let me continue two months; then I must stop again and pick cotton two and a half months. Pa says you are one of the grandest ladies among Liberals. He talks about you so often. We hav your photograph. Pa says he has had it seventeen years, long before I was born. Remember me kindly to all the children of the Corner. And now, as this is my first letter, I will close, hoping to see it in print ere long. I will write you occasionally if it is acceptable. I must close and get our dinner. Affectionately, your little orphan boy. Good-bye.

V. BURR CASEY.

[We shall snuggle you into the warmest place in the Corner, Burr. Tell us about cotton when you write again—how it grows, its blossom, fruit, and the picking of it. Yes, Leonard Geiger is better than gold. He thinks we do not know how much good he is doing, but it comes out every once in a while. Thank papa Casey for compliments. —ED. C. C.]

DORCHESTER, NEB., Feb. 8, 1891.

MISS S. H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I now take my pen in hand to write a letter to the Children's Corner. I like to read the letters in the Children's Corner. I go to school, but did not go to-day because it was stormy.

I like my teacher; her name is Miss Scherer. I hav two miles and a half to go to school.

I am twelve years old this June.

The reason why I cannot write any better is because I was left-handed, and after I got so I could write pretty good, the teacher made me write with my right hand—that set me back.

My grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I study reading, arithmetic, physiology, grammar, writing, geography, and spelling.

I go to the lyceum Friday nights and speak pieces. We hav speaking at our school every other Friday afternoon.

We had a snow here last Tuesday, the first snow we hav had to amount to anything.

I hav "The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I like to look at the pictures in it.

This is my first letter to the Children's Corner, and I want to surprise grandpa, as he does not know that I wrote it.

My papa and my grandpa like to read.

Papa takes four papers and so does grandpa, and after they get through reading them they exchange papers.

Grandpa thinks THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best of them all.

If you do not put this in the waste-basket I will write again some day.

Yours truly, a little Freethinker,

JESSE A. JOHNSON.

HOW TO

PRESERVE HEALTH.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

CONTENTS:

The Prevention of Disease—Hygiene of Different Organs—Age and Occupation—The Dwelling—The Care of the Sick—Nursing—The Family Physician—How to Give Aid in Emergencies—Contagious and Miasmatic Diseases—Diseases of the Nervous System—Altered Nutrition—The Respiratory and Digestiv and Urinary Tracts—The Skin—Parasites—Motherhood.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College, N. Y., says: "I regard your book, 'How to Preserve Health,' as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav ever met. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family and in the library of every school, for I think it would popularize a vast amount of important and useful knowledge, and thus be of great service to the community. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it; that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging, which our anxious grandmothers and others lacking the requisit elementary knowledge are too prone to indulge in, and oftentimes do great harm thereby. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

John B. Hamilton, M.D., Surgeon-General of the Navy, and Professor of Surgery, Georgetown University: "I thank you for the excellent book, 'How to Preserve Health.' I hav no doubt of the necessity of such books, and yours is of such merit that it will surely be successful."

Samuel Sherwell, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Skin, Brooklyn: "Your excellent treatise, entitled 'How to Preserve Health,' appears to me admirably adapted for the reading of the laity, correcting as it does a large number of false impressions that prevail among them. The direct suggestions, as in remarks on the skin, are of decided value."

CANCER and Tumors CURED: no knife: book free. Drs. GRATIGNY & DIX, No. 163 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Write me if you want to know more about it.

Please Don't Forget It.

James' Cannabis Indica is prepared in Calcutta, India, from the purest and best Native Hemp, and is the only remedy either in that country or this that will positively and permanently cure Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Nasal Catarrh and Nervous Debility or break up a fresh cold in twenty-four hours. $2.50 a bottle, three bottles for $6.50. Gems of Thought.

PEOPLE ask me, if I take away the Bible what are we going to do? How can we get along without the revelation that no one understands? What are we going to do if we hav no Bible to quarrel about? What are we to do without hell?—Ingersoll.

No conscientious man can be truly happy except by ignoring the doctrin of future everlasting punishment.—Robert C. Adams.

THE medieval miracle-creed still lurks in the popular explanation of the more occult phenomena. While the natural sequence of cause and effect is, for instance, freely admitted in such plain cases as the stability of a well built house and the collapse of a rickety structure, the phenomena of health and disease, of atmospheric changes, or of the (apparent) caprices of fortune in war or games of chance are still ascribed to the interference of preternatural agencies.—Prof. Felix Oswald.

BIBLE miracles I hav demonstrated to be of no more value than pagan ones; and I hav sought to show that belief in miracles in past ages resulted from the ignorance and credulity of the masses who believed in them, and that, as the people become more intelligent and their knowledge increases, their belief in supernatural interference with the laws of nature gradually diminishes to the vanishing point.—Arthur B. Moss.

WHAT men want of reasons for their opinions they usually supply and make up in rage.—Tillotson.

THE question as to the general existence of religion among men is indeed, to a great extent, a matter of definition. If the mere sensation of fear, and the recognition that there are probably other beings more powerful than man, are sufficient alone to constitute a religion, then we must, I think, admit that religion is general to the human race. But, when a child dreads the darkness and shrinks from a lightless room, we never regard that as evidence of religion. Moreover, if these definitions be adopted, we cannot longer regard religion as peculiar to men. We must admit that the feeling of a dog or a horse toward its master is of the same character, and the baying of a dog to the moon is as much an act of worship as some ceremonies which hav been so described by travelers.—Lubbock in Origin of Civilization.

NOT alone in nature, but also in literature, the fathers were ignorant and unscholarly. Jerome and Origen were the only ones who could read Hebrew, unless we except Dorotheus. Justin Martyr quotes from Jeremiah and calls it Isaiah. Clement of Alexandria quotes as scripture passages which are not in the Bible. . . . In quoting from an opponent he would insert—not with intent to misrepresent, perhaps, but with the same result—words not in the original, and he even does the same in quoting from the Bible. Tertullian quotes as in Leviticus a passage not in that book; he misquotes history; he cites as in Isaiah a passage not in that book, but in Revelation, and he is frequently inaccurate in quotations. The gospel writers committed the same blunders. The man who wrote the gospel of Matthew attributes to Jeremiah a passage which is in Zechariah; and the writer of the gospel of Mark attributes to Isaiah a passage which is in Malachi. One curious illustration of this, and of how sacred books are formed, is seen in the excess of the Catholic over the Protestant Bible. The former has quite a number of books which are not in the latter—such as the two of Maccabees and the Song of the Three Children—which Protestants call the apocryphal Old Testament, but which Catholics consider as much the word of God as any other books. The reader has already seen that the ancient Jews did not consider these authoritativ, and the Palestinian Jews did not include them in the sacred collection. The Greek Jews, however, thought more of them, and the Alexandrian Jews placed them in an appendix to the Greek canons at the end of their Bibles, the same as they used to be printed in our old Bibles. The early Christians of Africa could not read Hebrew; they had to use the Greek manuscripts; and as they saw the apocryphal books in the collection, they supposed they were a part of it. The result was that the early Bible-makers in the African church included the apocryphal books because they were not intelligent enough to leave them out.—Bronson C. Keeler.

SUSAN H. WIXON, of the Fall River school committee, says she will urge the establishment of school kitchens in the Fall River public schools. She thinks the ability to translate Horace is a prettier accomplishment if accompanied by the knowledge how to bake bread and fry potatoes.—New York World.

THE Bowman Evangelical Conference at Allentown, Pa., on the 2d deposed from the ministry and expelled from the church the Rev. N. A. Barr, of Adamstown, for gross slander and defamation of character. The Rev. S. P. Spreng brought the charges, on the strength of postal cards written by Barr to Spreng, in which occur these words: "Bob Ingersoll is the champion blasphemer. You are fast gaining the reputation of being the champion liar of America. If you hav a superior, it must be Isher, Horn, Bowman, and Yeakel. Not for all the bishops' hats, historical chairs, and editorial tripods in the world would I want to be in your place. Yours in pity."

A DISPATCH to a Catholic paper reads: "Columbus, O., Feb. 25.—The Catholics of Ohio will appreciate the services of Mr. Tuthill, state librarian, in adding to the state library a valuable collection of Catholic books. Several hundred volumes of fiction, philosophy, history, and poetry by noted Catholic writers, were received lately. Heretofore in the selection and purchase of books, Catholics hav been ignored, Mr. Tuthill being the first librarian who has shown any consideration to the claims of justice which might hav been urged by Catholics." We wonder if "the claims of justice which might hav been urged by" Freethinkers, that they should also be represented, will meet with the same consideration.

IN the committee of the whole the Minnesota senate has recommended that the following bill be passed: "That any female person who shall, upon the stage or platform in any theater or opera house, concert hall or any public place whatever where other persons are present, expose her nether limb or limbs dressed in tights so called, or in any manner whatever so that the shape or form of her nether limb or limbs are plainly visible to such other persons present, shall be guilty of open and gross lewdness and lascivious behavior and guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $100, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than five days nor more than thirty."

RELIGIOUS zeal explained two cases of voluntary starvation admitted to the Barge Office hospital at New York a few days ago. The patients—Michael Bucher, thirty-seven years old, and Mrs. Dwara Elyson, seventy years—were passengers on the Cunard steamer Umbria, which arrived Sunday from Liverpool and Queenstown. They came from Russian Poland, and both are orthodox Hebrews of the strictest sort. They told Dr. Guiteras that after reaching Hamburg, Germany, which was four days before they embarked on the Umbria, they could find no "Kosher" food, or food prepared after the manner prescribed by the Hebrew religion. On board the Umbria they met the same difficulty, and during the entire voyage they subsisted on flour and water, refusing to touch any of the meats or other articles of food prepared on board. They were seven days on the voyage, and had been for eleven days practically without food when they reached the Barge Office. They were too weak to walk and were greatly emaciated.

AT the "gambol" of the Lambs' Club at the Broadway Theater, New York, last week, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll opened the exercises with what was styled on the program an introductory address, but which the genial colonel himself designated as a "talk." And a very plain talk it was, too, for it was addressed not only to the actors on the stage but to the people who sit as auditors to hear and see theatrical representations. Colonel Ingersoll came out flat-footed against the so-called realistic dramas of the day, denounced them vigorously and advocated the cultivation of more of the ideal in stage presentations. While he did not advocate the tearful and lugubrious to the exclusion of everything else, neither did he go in for the continuous grin and the desire to make laughter prominent above all things. The blending of pathos and merriment, he thought, ought to be the aim of our actors and playwrights. Colonel Ingersoll's talk was vigorously applauded throughout. This speech of Colonel Ingersoll's was spoken very poetically at times. The Herald in its account of the entertainment designates Colonel Ingersoll as a "Lion Lamb," and further uses this amusing language: "That merry-hearted lamb that has no wool on the top of his head, Colonel 'Bob' Ingersoll, made the bow for the Lambs, and welcomed everyone from the stage, urging every young man to form a club by marrying his best girl and then waiting for membership."

WITH the marks of nails on both hands and feet, James Quinn, an old man, lay on a cot in the Philadelphia Hospital on the 27th ult., suffering from wounds self-inflicted while seeking to crucify himself as his savior was crucified. Though the pain of the wounds must hav been intense, the old man seemed not to notice it, but to suffer great mental agony over imaginary sins. He clasped his hands in constant prayer in penance for past misdeeds. For years he has been a religious enthusiast, but his family had never seen any reason to suppose that his monomania on this subject would lead him to do any injury to himself. For the previous week he had been unusually wild in his religious ideas, and on Thursday night the climax came. Roughly marking out the form of a cross upon the floor, and procuring an old hammer and some nails, he was ready for the self-sacrifice. Placing a nail upon his right foot, a sharp blow from the hammer drove it clean through. Great as the agony must hav been, he probably made no sound, knowing that it would arouse his mother, son, or daughter. Another nail was placed upon the other foot, but the blow from the hammer failed to drive it through. It struck a bone, in which it became imbedded. Laying his left hand flat upon the floor, with the palm upward, he drove a third nail deep into the flesh. While seeking to drive a fourth nail into his right hand, which must necessarily hav been a very difficult operation considering the laceration of his other hand, the family were awakened and Quinn was prevented from completing the job.

What Is a Messiah?

In debating any controversial subject it is well that each disputant should know the meaning of the terms used by his opponent and by himself. Offense is often taken by misconstruing some remark of another. Once on a time two men fell to wrangling on the question of the annual production of corn in the world and the countries which produced the most. They figured and disputed till each thought the other an idiot. The Englishman had included all cereals in the term "corn," while the Yankee had been thinking only of our great maize crop. Neither one knew what the other was talking about.

Now, as men will differ so much on provable questions relating to things of this little world of ours, it should be no wonder that, when they leave the cornfield to dig with the same tools in the boundless, unfathomable, mystic field of theology, they should raise hell and discord.

Most persons imagin something they call God, and are terribly afraid of it. The savage pictures a savage God smashing things with lightnings and storms. The cruel man's God is a God of wrath, "taking vengeance on his enemies"—dealing in slaughter and pestilence. The more merciful man carves in his mind a more merciful God, and sings of his "loving-kindness," even though a hurricane has just destroyed his growing corn. Many people of the present age hav adopted an ancient God and undertaken to clothe it with garments of love and peace without first removing its fighting costume and washing off the war-paint. He who steals, and is just intelligent enough to know it is wrong, will hav his God say to other folks, Thou shalt not steal. Man is his own model in constructing a God, hence many gods with different attributes.

Barbarous tribes are prone to evolve prophets to sing their woes and their glories. The Jewish prophets, like a king's jester, were allowed great indulgence in innuendo and prognosticating evil; and although the Bible word prophet means little more than our word minstrel, many folks of to-day imagin that the ancient prophet was given to see a map of the future for ages to come, and are studying the affairs of this age from that old map. They hav attached an unwarrantable meaning to the word prophet.

The old Bible angel was supposed to be somewhat superior to man; to dwell in some celestial border-land, and to be employed in bringing messages to men and women. In those days angel signified "messenger," and he was the mail-carrier from myth land. He had all the faculties and passions of man, however—would eat, drink, and curse just the same, and often meddled with women. It is solemnly recorded that when he made love to a woman the progeny was a prophet or a giant. But the Christian has completely metamorphosed the ancient angel. He has changed the sex to the femininn, and attached to her now Grecian form convenient wings, so that she can hover about us with ease. And the angel doesn't cohabit with mortal women any more.

Now, a greater and more important mistake is made, through Christian imagination, in regard to the Bible messiah. Chambers's Cyclopedia says: "The oldest biblical records in the messianic indications refer to the high degree of prosperity which the chosen people expected for themselvs." The same authority says also: "The word Christ is Greek, signifies anointed, and corresponds exactly in meaning with the Hebrew word messiah." Either word signifies one anointed. All the kings of Israel were anointed, and thus were believed to be guided by heavenly power or influence. David was not only anointed, but was called lord and a man after God's own heart.

All people are apt to flatter themselvs that they are the special objects of divine care; and the Jews held this conceited notion in excess. They had been slaves in Egypt and in Babylon; and they sang praises to their God, who they believed had with a strong hand delivered them, and would make of them a great nation. Notwithstanding David destroyed seventy thousand of them at a lick, they looked upon his reign as the most glorious one in all their history; and though he did some things which nowadays would send the doer to the gallows, he was much exalted for his success in thrashing the heathen round about and taking much spoil. And when this brilliant throne of David fizzled out through the reigns of a few inferior successors, and the Jews found themselvs the unwilling subjects of Rome, they naturally looked for another anointed Moses or Joshua to deliver them from Roman bondage and restore the kingdom and house of David. No thought of any other kind of savior. That is where the Jews stood in the time of King Herod.

But Christian or Essene monks, in process of time, concocted the fabulous story that Augustus Cæsar ordered the whole world to be taxed; that a certain Joseph and his espoused wife, to pay their tax, went from Nazareth to the city of Bethlehem (a journey on foot or ass-back of about seventy miles) in cold December, at a time, too, when the days were accomplished that the wife should be delivered of a child; that she did giv birth to a son as soon as they found quarters in a stable, and that some shepherds came that very night and inquired, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? Now, this question suggests no thought of a savior or king of the world—much less that a God had come in that manner. But this chapter of the story got abroad before the Christian system was half made up. Follow briefly the story: Herod, on hearing of this young king of the Jews, orders the slaughter of all the infants in Bethlehem; the parents of this prodigy flee with it to far-off Egypt; and when this Herod is dead, they go back by a long round-about way to their home in Nazareth. And, curiously, all these incidents take place "that the scriptures might be fulfilled." And very strange it is, this king is not seen or heard of again till he is twelve years old and gets lost in Jerusalem. Then, when his parents found him after a three days' hunt, his mother scolded him, saying, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold thy father and I hav sought thee sorrowing." And he went home with them. This is another premature chapter in the story. It furnishes poor material with which to make a God. Yet more strange it is, that this king is not seen or heard of again till he is about thirty years old. He is then brought out from somewhere, made to say strange things in an incoherent manner, perform some new miracles, and is anointed by magdalenes from head to feet with ointment of palm-oil or goose-grease. He is also made to denounce about everything and everybody on earth; and he is finally charged with blasphemy and sedition, and brought to execution.

There is presented a piece of very weak timber in this God structure; for, when Pilate asks, "Art thou king of the Jews?" Jesus replies in the affirmativ. Here is at most only a king of the Jews—no universal king or savior of the world—much less a God. If Jesus was a God, why did he not giv some intimation of the important fact himself, instead of leaving the claim to be made by some John a century or so later? This chapter also of the Christian story lacks the cunning of a skilful architect. It does not well support the superstructure. In fact, the Christian system is a structure of patchwork wrought upon by monks and dreamers for two or three centuries; but which falls in pieces on the first touch of reason. It is a great castle in the air with no substantial foundation. During that visionary time it seems that all study in science, art, and practical philosophy was suspended, and that mystic, speculativ theology absorbed all attention.

But the Jews never could see that this Jesus fulfilled any scripture, or that he possessed any qualifications to restore the kingdom of David; and many of them deny that any such person as the Christian's Jesus ever lived. The Christian, however, entertains the absurd notion that the Jews did not understand their own language, but that he (the Christian), a thousand miles distant and centuries later, can!

Now, whether this particular Jesus lived or not, when we think of the disagreements, disputes, quarrels, excommunications, persecutions, and fightings that took place among the so-called early Christians; their destruction, so soon as they got power, of all literature they could hunt up that did not suit their dogmas—stifling the intellect of the world in fire and dungeon for a thousand years; using a cross as divine authority for robbing and slaughtering millions of innocent people; their fanatical crusades against those of other religions, and the interminable religious wars among themselvs—the conviction is forced upon us that Christianity brought, not immortality, but hell to light. And all this was the result of mistaking the true meaning of the Hebrew word messiah.

L. G. Reed.

A Second.

In the issue of The Truth Seeker of the 7th inst., F. W. Evans put in nomination Mr. Ingersoll for president; and I, being a citizen of the same republic and believing that the undertaking, should it succeed, would be for its best interest and welfare, do most cordially second the nomination. In so doing it may not be considered out of place by some to portray some of the qualities of the nominee which so eminently fit him for the office. His distinguished ability as a statesman, his high rank in the legal profession, his patriotism and devotion to his country, and his generous and liberal sentiments on political and religious questions, are so well known that any attempt on my part to portray them would hardly be more than an idle waste of words. His unpopularity among certain rigid doctrinal church-members, caused by his excellent lectures and orations, and successful discussions with some of the most prominent writers and clergy of the age, in showing up the inconsistency and fanaticism of many religious beliefs, ought not, with those who appreciate the generous and charitable impulses of his nature, to be any objection to the movement. Although an Infidel and having great regard and love for his noble acts and truthful sayings, yet I do not second the nomination because he has too much respect and reverence for the Great Cause or god of the universe to accuse him of being the author of the Koran or of that collection of filthy, silly contradictions, the Bible. I do not do it because his views are not in harmony with the professedly inspired writers of the old scriptures, especially as to the right of men to use their wives as mere slaves, nor with St. Paul, whether inspired or not, in having so little respect for woman as not to allow her to express a single thought in her own church. I do not do it because he has such a horror for the burning of Bruno and Servetus, the tortures of the Christian rack and thumbscrew, and the thousands of other heinous, atrocious, and infamous crimes committed in the name of Christianity simply on account of a little difference of opinion about a hereafter of which they knew nothing, any more than we. I do not do it expecting in any wise to increase or enlarge the esteem and admiration in which he is now held by the great elements of science and progress; for the luster of no position, however exalted, can outshine the brilliancy of his fame already achieved in his grand efforts, in behalf of humanity, to clear away the dark clouds of superstition and bigotry from the nineteenth century.

It may be well to remember, in seeking him for the place, his desire to be unfettered in word and thought, which is probably well known, particularly in one instance. This was when, a few years ago, at a time when a nomination was almost equivalent to an election in Illinois, a convention offered him the governorship, if during the campaign he would keep silent on religious questions. But his positiv reply in the negativ, knowing that he could not in any wise even be provoked to allude to such matters during the political issue, however untrammeled in liberty of expression, shows clearly the magnanimity of his resolute mind, and his inflexibility of purpose not to be burdened for any time by any pledge, however great the inducement.

While a prisoner in the late civil war, thinking it best on one occasion to make a few statements in regard to the situation, although under the power and control of the enemy, and without permit to do so, he made the attempt. After a few friendly, social words, quite a collection of soldiers was gathered, who were much pleased and interested in his remarks. A group of officers near by who were also interested said to themselvs: "This will not do. If we let him continue, he may convince our own men that they are not fighting for a just cause." So they closed his lips. The salaried priests and clergy, if they had the same power, would not only smother every thought that flows from his generous soul, but consign every publication, if not himself, to the burning flame. What would Ingersoll's retaliation be to such a procedure?—Injure them not, but teach them better.

With such a character at the head of the nation there would not be a hamlet, town, or village in it but that the people thereof, women as well as men, could hav a voice in choosing their own postmasters, even if contrary to their Congressman's choice. And every inhabitant, no matter what his political or religious belief, whether Mohammedan, Buddhist, or Jew, or either of the score or more of different Christian divisions, would be shown the same courtesy. And if he had the authority, every person, sect, or church would be protected in the right of selecting their own day of rest, and not be compelled to keep in sanctity some other day also, against their convictions of right, only because they were in the minority—as is done, contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, throughout our land.

Colonel Ingersoll is unexcelled by any of our presidents in the requisit qualifications to discharge the official duties, and with but little variance with a majority of them on religious questions, but unlike them in having the courage and manhood to let his honest thoughts be known to the world, knowing at the same time that he would elicit the hatred and contempt of those fanatics who so dread and fear to hav their sacred dogmas tinctured with the truth.

These are a few reasons why I so heartily second the nomination.

W. L. Ryder.

Monticello, Ind.

The Puritan Inquisition.

Some months ago, Moses Harman, editor of Lucifer at Valley Falls, Kan., was prosecuted by instigation of Postmaster-general Wanamaker, for mailing his paper containing articles charged as obscene. The first of these was a narrativ, written in a tone of serious indignation, of an outrage by a husband on the person of a sick and mutilated wife, inflicting irreparable injuries, and of which no law took cognizance. The persons not being named, it is difficult to see what use this narrativ could serve, but still more difficult to see what it had in common with obscenity, which, as generally understood, flatters lust. The practical point, however, is not the definition of obscenity; but of who are the constitutional and legal, as well as moral, censors of the press. Are they the subscribers to each publication, and its purchasers on whom its continuation depends; or are they postmasters and judges, directed by the central government, the president and his appointee the postmaster-general? If the latter, when was this feature engrafted on the United States Constitution? Whatever local laws may be in Kansas, they must require considerable stretching and twisting to put a man in jail for five years for presuming to differ with his judge upon a point of taste, without having injured anybody otherwise than by provoking a whiff of disgust. And this without even complaint of his subscribers. And this while lecherous novels pass unnoticed and family newspapers welcome them. And this for mention of acts to which the laws attach no penalty. And this while almost every daily and weekly has columns of criminal narrativs saturating the popular mind with the details of evil. Neither editor was tried at home nor allowed to appeal. Heywood was arrested and sentenced in Boston; Harman taken to Missouri and sentenced by Judge Phillips, without a jury, after having been released under a writ of error from a prior sentence by Judge Foster. Wanamaker's intervention was evident in Heywood's case by a telegram to the prosecution, "Push Heywood." It is also affirmed relativ to Harman's. The alleged offenses in both cases were of the same utterly frivolous character. For the true inwardness of these prosecutions it must be known that, beneath the pretended obscenity, there was in both cases a pronounced tendency to "free thinking," and in Harman's this was formulized as one of the counts against him. Heywood was not very obnoxious to the church, since they kept the communion grape-juice in his Washingtonian cellar; but he was a Democrat, and had caused the defeat of his local postmaster in a previous election. Hence the entente cordiale between this functionary and the postmaster-general of Sunday-school celebrity and pie-crust piety. Both editors are poor men, husbands and fathers, and unreproached in their family or civic relations. The general tendency of both papers inculpated was decidedly toward greater continence and Malthusian policy in marriage; in no respect pandering to lustful ideas, but asserting the sovereignty of woman in sex relations.

Wanamaker, on his side, is bent on asserting postal sovereignty over the whole domain of the press. Reid, the medium, imprisoned for fraudulent advertisments, was not permitted to giv the court evidence of his peculiar powers, which he offered, but condemned upon the arbitrary denial of them and consequent presumption of fraud in their advertisment, while excluding the testimony of Reid's clients in support of them. Such tactics of despotism are remarkable in Prosecutor Ady, viz., "There must be some sort of tribunal to determin what is obscene and what is not so. In this case, your Honor's mind [Judge Phillips]." If upon looking at this article, you say it is obscene, then the presumption of the law is that Harman knew it was obscene and he must suffer the consequences of his deliberate act in depositing that in the mail."

Mr. Harman replies: "The presumption of the law is a very convenient one for a man predetermined to convict another in a matter depending altogether on opinion, and not upon fact. It is precisely the old argument that sent thousands to prison or to the stake for differing from their judges about blasphemy and heresy. Joseph Ady will be remembered for his zeal in prosecuting heretics to the peculiar code of morality now enforced by fines and imprisonment, at the instigation of the American inquisition."

Mr. Ady elsewhere pretends that it is possible to determin what constitutes the crime of obscenity just as well as any other. Well, then, replies Mr. Harman: "Take a case of murder. The first thing is to show that some one has been killed; then, that some person killed him, then that the killer acted with malicious intention. Try to apply such common sense tactics to the alleged crime of obscenity!"

Where indeed is the spiritual corpus delicte, when the language used is inoffensiv to its readers, and which none need read unless they choose! I myself, a subscriber to Lucifer, disliked its tone and stopped it years ago, but it never occurred to me that the editor ought to rot in jail for not flattering my taste, the offense against which implies my own passivness, as when I quit reading it ceases. The prosecuting judges and attorneys impute to their victims their own subjectiv impressions, as in presuming that "Harman knew what he printed to be obscene." Even if so, who is the worse for it, unless himself? To assume that some people are prevented from doing evil, by showing how evil some other people are; or that the mere mentioning of such evil will do more than natural aversion, instinctiv and magnetic, for keeping the pure aloof from the foul, is a delusion. No publicity can add to the contempt with which the monstrosities in question are regarded; but they are far from being as mischievous to society as the crimes that befoul our dailies and weeklies, and to which no legal exception has ever been taken. It is curious that our puritanical rulers should begin by making it criminal to write about acts which they hav not rendered it a crime to commit, by attaching a penalty to them. This inconsistency is on par with their pretended *Christ*ian Sabbath, the prohibitiv character of which, their own gospels say, was repudiated by Jesus, whose worshipers they pretend to be; then by his apostles and the fathers of the Christian church, by its popes, and with emphasis by Luther, by Calvin, by Melancthon, by Milton, by the eminent Church of England writers, all recognizing, with Moses in Exodus, the commandment of Sabbath-keeping as exclusiv on the Jews, "a sign and a bond" between them and Yahvah, and these Jews themselvs keep their Saturday festivly.

Between the two fanaticisms, that of Harman and Heywood for stirring a stench, and that of the puritan millionaire shopkeeping skinflint, doubled with the president, in our postal despotism, by their Sabbath prohibitions; it is difficult to assign the palm of absurdity; but in their rivalry of censorship in morals, the earthen pot naturally gets broken by the iron pot.

The unofficial crank is naturally limited in his influence to the fellowship of his particular craze; he can not be aggressiv; but the official crank, imposing his will like a driving-wheel by the judicial and police machinery of a vast area over unwilling millions, compromises at once business, pleasure, health, social order, and personal liberty, in the exclusiv interest of a church monopoly, the same that has instigated the persecutions of Freethinkers, now, as in the past of Christendom. Harman and Heywood in jail make the entering wedge for "God in the Constitution."

The reckless and insolent malignity of Wanamaker's legal tools in the persecution of Harman appears in such counts as the following, answered by Harman to Judge Phillips, from the argument of Mr. Ady of Kansas City. Three of these counts are for mailing his paper to a subscriber and to two others at their request. Also, "I am accused of publishing a paper in the interest of the freedom of the press. To this I plead guilty. And if this be crime, then I am a criminal. I regard the freedom of the press as the palladium of all our liberties. I am also accused of making an obscene article in the paper called Lucifer. As the offense called obscenity is an offense against good taste only, not against life or property, and as there are as many standards of taste as there are persons, I do not undertake to speak for others than myself, and for myself I say, I am not guilty of this charge. I know what the postal law is in this matter, and while I maintain that it is a foolish, un-American, invasiv, and very dangerous law, I do not think anything I published properly comes under it."

It is needless to follow Mr. Harman in his citations drawn from the O'Neil letter or his defense of its usefulness. What he proves is only his own sincerity and the fact that his subscribers hold views like his own. They form a sort of semi-ascetic sect, whose doctrin is Malthusian, in so far as differing from the general views of Secularists or labor agitators, or of Anarchists. The sexual abuses on which they insist are deplorable, but, dependent on woman's industrial dependence, can find no cure short of her industrial emancipation. They will cease of themselvs, when cooperativ housekeeping is substituted for that of the isolated family.

Mr. Ady's last charge is that Harman mailed the paper containing the O'Neil letter, after he was arrested for having sent another copy of the same, showing on his part "a determination and a defiance against the powers of government as interpreted through the ordinary tribunals." An arrest, it appears, is for Mr. Ady proof of guilt. Mr. Harman replies: "If to assert and maintain my citizen right to publish and mail whatever I think will be for the public good, irrespectiv of what a prosecuting attorney, ten or fifteen years my junior, may think about it, be an act of defiance, then I plead guilty. I certainly do not owe any allegiance to prosecuting attorneys or the grand juries manipulated by them. I claim the right here and now, and to my latest breath, whether in prison or out of prison, I hope I shall never cease to defend the same right, for every man to publish and circulate through the common mail anything whatever, subject only to personal responsibility, on proof that I hav injured anyone in person, property, or reputation." He concludes: "I know not what my sentence is to be; but if I had a hundred, a thousand, or a million lives, all in the prime of manhood, instead of but one life, now in the sere and yellow leaf; all those lives, in prison or out of prison, should be spent in defense of the rights of free speech, free press, and honest investigation, and in defense of woman's right to own and control her own person—in defense of the right of unborn millions to a purer heredity, fatherhood and motherhood, so that in years to come there may be fewer born imbecils to fill asylums and poorhouses, fewer born criminals to fill prisons and furnish employment at high salaries for prosecuting attorneys, sheriffs, hangmen, jail-keepers, and penitentiaries. I ask no clemency, but justice only. I know that I hav sought to injure no one by what I hav published. If it is the will of the man who now holds my liberty, probably my life, in his hands, that I shall go to prison, so be it. I can much better afford to end my days in prison than you, Judge Phillips, can afford to send me there." Can the American nation afford it?

Troublous Times for the Faith.

From the New York Sun.

The committee appointed by the last general assembly of the Presbyterians to revise the Westminster Confession in accordance with the recommendations of the presbyteries has closed its sessions at Washington, after having practically completed its task.

As the committee consists of representativs of both the majority in favor of revision and the minority opposed to such changes, and as its deliberations hav proceeded without friction, undoubtedly the amendments advised will be of the nature of compromises. The doctrin of election will be sugar-coated with a statement of the loving-kindness of God, and the damnation of non-elect infants and of the heathen will not be proclaimed, but will be left for logical inference. In other words, the terms of the Confession will be made more palatable to the refined and skeptical sentiment of the day, but the substance of its doctrin will remain the same. It is a body of faith so logical and consistent throughout that no part can be removed without destroying the cohesivness of the whole. All that the committee on revison can do is to stick on a little ornament here and here to hide the ruggedness of the construction and to giv it an appearance more grateful to the sensitiv religious taste of the Presbyterians of the present time.

Of course the report of the committee will not be final. It can only propose changes which will not be made until they are approved by two-thirds of the presbyteries; and hence the agitation of the subject will only receive further stimulus. It will go on during several years to come; and meantime a question of far greater importance than the mere polishing up of the old Confession has arisen to complicate the situation. It is the question whether faith has any supernatural basis whatever.

The foundation of the faith of Christendom is the Bible. The church is built on the theory that the doctrins and statements of scripture are the revealed word of God concerning the truths of eternity, which else would be unknown to mankind. But Professor Briggs, the foremost teacher in the foremost of the Presbyterian schools of theology, instructs his students that the Bible is not the word of God, but a fallible book written by fallible men. So far as it is true, his doctrin is substantially, the Bible is of God, and only so far. Its truths, according to him, are limited by the capacity of its human writers to apprehend truth, and its errors are proportionate to the limitations of their knowledge and perceptions. If that is so, undoubtedly the superior intelligence and greater enlightenment of this day would be able to write a better and a truer Bible than the old scriptures. They would make it more strictly in accordance with the conclusions of modern science and philosophy, by which Professor Briggs givs his students the right to test the truth of the scriptures.

This is the instruction in biblical theology that candidates for the Presbyterian ministry now receive. It destroys the supernatural foundation of religion by rejecting the authority of the Bible as a revelation from heaven. The church is left with nothing to lean upon except the conclusions of human reason. The mystery of life and death, time and eternity, becomes unfathomable, for the intellect of man cannot sound those depths. It must giv up the problem and content itself with Agnosticism. If the Bible is not the revealed word of God, final and absolute in its truth, theology is mere guesswork, and the origin and destiny of man are unexplainable.

That is the momentous question now before the Presbyterians. Discussions of revisions of their creed is time thrown away until it is settled. If Professor Briggs is right, the whole Confession of Faith is built on fiction, and not on eternal verities. If he is right, it proceeds from false assumptions, by which the words of men are made the infallible word of God, and it is the construction of superstition and not a structure founded in revealed truth.

We hav come upon troublous times for the faith when theologians themselvs are working away with all their might to destroy its foundations.

CLERICAL despotism is still a potent ally of intemperance. In hundreds of British and North American cities the dearth of better pastimes drives our workingmen to the pot house. They drink to get drunk, as the only available means of escaping tedium and the consciousness of their misery. Nature craves recreation, and the suppression of that instinct has avenged itself by its perversion.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald.

OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE BOARD.

The board of directors of the American Secular Union, at a meeting held at their office on March 2, 1891, agreed and resolved as follows:

That under present circumstances it is impracticable to appoint any field secretary or lecturer; and that, therefore, we rely upon and urgently request all liberally-minded people, to the extent of their ability, to further the employment and support of those Liberal lecturers now in the field who are helping the American Secular Union in its work, and who can thus do for the society the work of a field secretary.

That, for the third time in the present administration, we call upon Liberal lecturers to assist in the work of Liberal organization, by forming unions or societies to be connected with the American Secular Union, so that it may become in fact, as well as in name, the rallying point and coöperativ body of the Liberals of the United States. And, since the matter has been so thoroughly discussed in the papers, and several lecturers hav shown so earnest a desire to cooperate in the work so dear to all, we trust that this third call will be responded to promptly by every lecturer.

That this course is now imperativly demanded by the work which presses upon us. There are measures affecting the dearest rights of those who would be free from ecclesiastical control and influence now pending before Congress and state legislatures, in which this society should take an activ interest. The measures which we hav already taken in regard to the opening of the World's Fair at Chicago, and the inspection of religious and eleemosynary institutions, all need to be pushed to practical results.

There is also a large amount of literature which should be distributed without delay.

In order to further these matters already undertaken, we must hav means, and we urgently request all liberally-minded people to come to the support of these undertakings, by sending us the sinews of war in immediate contributions, or subscriptions upon which we can rely for the future.

We urgently request all Liberals to rally to the support of the local auxiliary societies, and to cause them to report monthly or otherwise to the secretary, so that our literature may be circulated through them, and so that the proper petitions may reach the people through them and be signed.

In view of the necessities of the work, all differences hav disappeared; and we ask the Liberals of every phase to unite with us in heartily and unitedly pushing the measures which were never more necessary than now.

We hav great pleasure in announcing that the matter of the prize essay for Secular moral instruction has been brought to a successful report and the award of the prize. The president has also negotiated the publication of the work in book form, without expense or responsibility to the Union, in a manner that will be highly satisfactory to all.

With one accord, we now ask all to join us in furthering the work of the American Secular Union.

The Prize Awarded.

More than a year ago, a prize of one thousand dollars ($1 000) was offered by the American Secular Union "for the best essay, treatis, or manual adapted to aid and assist teachers in our free public schools and in the Girard College for orphans, and other public and charitable institutions professing to be unsectarian, to thoroughly instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality, without inculcating religious doctrins; thus recognizing the legal right under our federal Constitution of all our citizens, Jews and gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, Liberals and Agnostics, and all other classes, whether believers or disbelievers, to hav their children instructed in all the branches of a common secular education in our state schools, without having their tender minds biased for or against any sect or party whatever."

Nearly twelve months were allowed for the preparation of this manual, which was to contain not less than sixty thousand, nor more than one hundred thousand words. More than fifty persons of all classes, but mostly professional, sent in elaborate manuscripts. The committee appointed by the subscribers to the fund to examin the papers consisted of R. B Westbrook, chairman; Prof. Felix Adler, A M., of the Ethical Culture Society; Prof Daniel G. Brinton, M.D., of the University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Frances Emily White, M.D., of the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, and Ida C. Craddock, secretary. The work of examining so many manuscripts by so large a committee was simply immense. The task is at last completed. The committee decided that no one manuscript presented fully met the conditions of the offer, but that two of them together did, clearly showing that morality can be taught without teaching theology, and how to do it. The one-thousand-dollar prize was ordered to be equally divided between two gentlemen. They hav accepted the award, and the essays will be published in one volume.

The successful contestants are Nicholas Paine Gilman, A.M., editor of the Literary World, Boston, and author of a most popular book on "Profit-Sharing;" and Edward Payson Jackson, A.M., master and professor of physical science in the celebrated Latin school of Boston, and author of several successful books. It is believed that these essays cannot fail to meet the views of the most conservativ, as well as the most radical student.

The committee sincerely sympathize with the large number of disappointed contestants. Several of the essays were of a high order—some of them too high for our purpose. A number of them are to be published by the writers. However, all of the contestants hav been personally profited by the labor of writing, and a most important question has occupied the best thoughts of the most thoughtful and intelligent persons in the community. We extend our hearty thanks to all who hav so kindly written, not so much for the prize as for the cause.

The title of Mr. Gilman's work is: "The Laws of Daily Conduct: a Manual of Practical Morals for Teachers and Parents." The title of Mr. Jackson's work is: "Dr. Don's Morning Talks: a Colloquy on Good Morals." The book will appear on or about Sept. 1. 1891 R B. WESTBROOK, Pres. A. S. U.

The Flag and Pansy Leaflet.

We are sending out this week to each of our members a copy of our new leaflet. It is a small leaflet—of eight pages only—and is gotten up especially with a view to circulation among outsiders, who know little or nothing of our principles, and who therefore remain indifferent to our work, not from any real hostility, but from ignorance.

Here is a chance for Freethinkers to help the cause by judicious circulation of these leaflets. Try what you can do with the copy which we send you; and then send us thirty-five cents for a dozen more, or $1 for three dozen. Two young girls in a Western town, who hav joined during the past year, write us: "The attractiv pamphlet setting forth the principles of the American Secular Union we will keep in a conspicuous place, where callers may see it, and on every suitable occasion we will call the attention of our friends to it. By this means, perhaps we can induce a few to read and investigate further." That is just the right use to make of this little lithographed leaflet; and you cannot do better than follow the missionary example of these young girls. Keep our circular on your parlor or sitting-room table, or on your office desk, where its gay colors will catch the eye, so that the casual caller will be induced to take it up; and then you will hav an entering wedge, not only for Secularization of the state—the principle for which the American Secular Union works first and foremost—but you will hav a chance (especially if you hav acted on the suggestions of that circular regarding a badge) of doing a little off-hand preaching in behalf of your particular phase of Freethought, whether that phase be Materialism or Spiritualism, Deism or Atheism, or any other.

One leaf of the circular is devoted to the matter of a universal badge for Freethinkers. Therein we hav spoken of Otto Wettstein's "Freethought, Science, Reason vs. Superstition," and of the "Universal Mental Liberty" badge of the late Lady Churchill; and last, but not least, of the pansy. This latter, we may here remark, seems to be growing in favor. Since France adopted the pansy, Belgium, Sweden, and Spain hav followed suit; and now Dr. Voelkel, and also Dr. Specht, secretary of the German Freethought Association, are advocating it, so that it seems likely that Germany, too, will ere long fall into line on this badge. Our Canadian brethren, also, seem to view the idea with favor. Capt. Robert Adams, president of the Canadian Secular Union, writes to us that he is much pleased with it, so that he has already obtained several pins for friends.

Even John Wanamaker's manager of the jewelry department has gotten wind of the pansy badge; and, when I was purchasing a pansy pin there during Christmas week, I found that he had already consulted jewelry manufacturers as to prices, designs, etc., and that he was quite anxious to get us up a pin, and on very reasonable terms, too. Only think what a "judgment" it would be, if the man whom some of our brethren stigmatize as "Holy John," and who symbolizes to them all that is calamitous in a union of church and state, should come to be the means of furnishing a rallying standard for the Freethought army, before whose assaults the Christian church is already shaken to her very foundations!

In my address at Portsmouth, indeed, I said, referring to the pansy as a Freethought badge: "Think what it would mean to hav such a badge worn by all Liberals, at all times! Suppose, for instance, that Liberals got into the way of having their letter-paper and envelopes stamped with a pansy. Why, there would be a sensation in the post-office when those myriads of pansies began to blossom out, I can tell you! John Wanamaker would think twice before he closed the mails to any honest seeker after truth—realizing, as he would, the surprising extent of the Freethought constituency." Slowly, but surely, the pansy is winning its way as a badge of Freethought. The wife of one of our most prominent life-members, herself a life-member and a faithful supporter of the American Secular Union, was so impressed by our suggestions at Portsmouth, that, upon her return, she had made for herself a beautiful and costly pansy pin, which she wears constantly as her testimony in behalf of Freethought principles. From a town in Iowa there came, some months ago, the request that we should, as a society, formally urge the adoption of this badge among our people, and adding that, if we kept these badges on sale, our friends in that town could dispose at once of at least six or eight. In the branch post-office which has a room in the same building as the American Secular Union has its room, are two officials whom I regularly furnish with our latest pamphlets, as they seem kindly disposed toward the Liberal cause. Some days since, one of these gentlemen said to me, pointing to his comrade: "See, Miss Craddock, Frank is wearing the pansy badge." What do you suppose the badge was? Only the lithographed pansy blossom cut out of our circular, a little margin of paper left along the stem and inked, to giv the stem body, and pinned on our friend's coat lapel! That was a whole week ago; but the pansy still shines with undiminished luster against its dark background, and has evoked many a word of praise from its wearer's friends.

But whether you, my friend, individually believe in badges or not, we hope that you will make use of our latest circular in some way in behalf of the work so dear to all. We hav had quarrels enough in our ranks this winter, and personalities which, if kept up, can only result in damage to the cause of Freethought. While we contend among ourselvs, our church enemies gain ground, and Secularization of the state becomes daily more impossible. The assertion that the American Secular Union is doing little or nothing for freedom of thought comes with a bad grace from those who are doing all they can to hinder the present management. Let us cease our differences, and, whatever our private bitternesses of feeling, resolve to press forward side by side under the banner of the American Secular Union, as loyal comrades as we are zealous fighters. Come, friends, what do you say? How many of you love the cause well enough to magnanimously refrain from further dispute, and to rally about the old standard once more? IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

A German Freethought Martyr.

It seems almost incredible that the land of Goethe and Harmann, of Humboldt and Haeckel, should on the eve of the nineteenth century be the scene of what seems to be a systematic persecution of Freethinkers by the authorities. Yet such is the case. And instead of diminishing, the persecution becomes more extensiv, more bigoted, and more uncompromising, and this in spite of the fact that millions of Germans never set foot in a church.

The reason for this persecution is evident. It is a well-known fact that the present emperor, who is half crazy, holds a very high opinion of the sacredness of royalty, and believes fully in the injunction about obedience to "the powers that be." Hence there can be no better ally for him than the orthodox parson and no better friend than Jehovah. To protect both becomes a question of self-preservation with him.

That the reader may understand how it is possible for him to render his wishes commands to the judges in the various states, it will be necessary to go back so far as 1862, when the foundation of official despotism was laid in Germany by the now retired chancellor, Prince Bismarck. Through threats and bribes he induced the Prussian supreme court to render a certain political decision, the wrong of which was evident even to a lunatic. Having thus set the precedent, the supreme court did not hesitate on succeeding occasions to become the tool of the government, and the minor courts and judges, who naturally would look to Berlin for a good example, found there nothing but corruption, and were not slow to discover that those judges who were most zealous to obey the government's wishes were most sure of promotion. The wars of 1864, 1866, and 1870 followed, German official unity was established, and although we hav several kingdoms and other minor "sovereign" states in Germany, there is virtually but one. Every command issued from Berlin is law in Germany, not alone in civil and social matters but also in military affairs in time of peace. The difference between the Prussian army and that of Saxony is, the former hav one row of buttons on their coats, the latter two; the Prussian soldiers wear gray and dark-blue uniforms, the Bavarian light-blue.

From the above facts it will be seen that official tyranny in Germany is easily practiced and profitable. Yet to the honor of the German legal profession be it said, that in matters of religion several judges refuse to follow the government's dictates. But many trucklers are still left—more than enough to disgrace the German nation and make justice a farce.

During the last year we hav from time to time, in "Items of Foreign Freethought News," given the readers of this journal information of the doings of the Freethinkers and the church in Europe. It will therefore be unnecessary to recount the cases of religious bigotry which hav disgraced Germany, hence we can confine ourselvs to what has taken place in the last month.

Since we wrote last, Mrs. Heinrich-Wilhelmi has been discharged in the suit brought against her last fall, and so hav Dr. Voelkel, in two minor indictments, and Mr. Schultze and Dr. Rüger Elberfeld; but as in Mülhhausen, Alsace, nine workingmen, in Berlin Mr. Peus, and in Bernburg Dr. Voelkel, hav been indicted for blasphemy, the latter being sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment, we think the situation is rather gloomy for Freethinkers in Germany.

The latest news from that country is that the court of Mülhhausen, Thüringen, on February 12th sentenced Dr. Voelkel to six months' imprisonment. The doctor, of course, has appealed to a higher court.

The activity and incessant prosecutions against our friend on account of his services to Freethought, cannot fail to arouse our sympathy for him and also a corresponding feeling of contempt for such a government and for judges who prostitute their office by trying to suppress free speech, free thought, and free press, the three necessary conditions to the existence of liberty.

Dr. Titus Voelkel, lecturer for the Freereligious Societies of Germany, and editor and proprietor of that excellent paper. Freireligioses Sonntags Blatt, was born Dec. 14, 1843, at Wirsitz, Prussian Poland, and is the son of a Roman Catholic physician and a Protestant mother. His father later became a Deist and Freemason, while his mother reached the stage of a Rationalist, and this mental evolution of the parents was fortunately consummated when young Voelkel reached school age, hence he was sent to a realschule—in this case a scientific academy, free from religious teachings of the orthodox kind. The teachers of this institution were Rationalists, one even an Atheist, hence there was no chance for theology to trouble young Voelkel's mind. The principal studies were natural philosophy in the line of Lamarck and Darwin, mathematics, history, and Latin, and later, French and English. The result was naturally that Dr. Voelkel and his brothers and school-mates were from their youth either Agnostics or Atheists.

From 1860 to 1865 the doctor studied, at the universities of Königsberg and Berlin, theology, natural philosophy, and mathematics. From 1865 to 1870 he lived in France, whence he returned when the war broke out, and for ten years following he served as teacher of French and natural philosophy in higher private schools, misunderstood by most, hated and feared by many on account of his political and religious Radicalism. Then he became editor, publisher, and lecturer, and he writes to us, "That I am now and shall be to the end."

An idea of the work performed by Dr. Voelkel can be imagined from the fact that in 1889—which was no extraordinary year—he gave 187 Freethought and 250 ethical lectures, and traveled 19 900 miles, besides attending to his editorial labors.

The doctor is at the present time publishing an excellent translation of Paine's "Age of Reason," which he enriches with numerous valuable and highly interesting notes of a critical and explanatory character. But better even than this is his Text-book for instruction in Freereligious Societies. It is impossible for us to do justice to this little work in an article of this kind; the book has to be read to be appreciated as it ought to be. The titles of a few of the chapters of Part I, which we hav lying before us, will giv our readers an idea of the subjects treated: Nature; Family; The Human Life, Its Development and Work; Truth; Justice; Liberty; Faith and Reason. How concise and yet how suggestiv is the opening sentence, what a field for instruction does it not open: "There is a book not written by man; it can be read by every creature; it is the only book that cannot be falsified—the great book of holy Nature." And here is his definition of Liberty: "Natural law is the highest liberty." Other quotations are: "In religions, as in everything else, all is natural." "On religion, as on any other subject, reason is the supreme judge." "Man needs truth, and he will find whatever he needs of it by a close application of his reasoning faculties."

In 1870 the doctor married, and he has now a large family, the youngest child six years of age; his domestic life is happy, and as he enjoys robust health we trust that he may continue for many years to come in the good work being done by him. And while the present age may be divided in opinion as to his merits and the value of his services to mankind, future generations in the land of Humboldt and Haeckel will look upon him as a benefactor, and the persecutions he now suffers under will each and all serve as recommendations commanding respect and honor to Dr. Titus Voelkel, the "most hated man," the standard-bearer of truth and liberty in Germany at the close of the nineteenth century.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

That new Freethought badge, the pansy, finds general favor. Spain and Portugal hav adopted it officially, and the Freethought papers of those countries advocate its general assumption.

A case of immoral relations between nuns and orphan boys left in their charge to be educated in the "love and fear of God," has come to light in Soag, Bohemia. The government has begun a bogus investigation.

Our brothers in Sweden are not satisfied with attending to missionary work at home. Mr. John Lindell, one of the most activ Freethinkers in Sweden, has left for Australia to carry the gospel of Light and Liberty to his countrymen there.

Religious persecution is the order of the day in Germany. The last number of the Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt reports no less than four new cases. We direct the reader's attention to the article, "A German Freethought Martyr," wherein there is presented a faithful picture of the religious persecutions in Germany.

The city council of Vienna is worth preserving for exhibition in a dime museum. Some time ago a school-boy committed suicide, and as reason for this act there was pointed out the "total absence of pictures of saints and Marys" in the schools. The aldermen voted instantly one thousand gülden for the purchase of such articles, to put a stop to the suicidal tendency, which at the present time has reached its periodical high-water mark.

A "Committee on Moral Laws" has been organized in France, with Mr. Jean Paul Cés as president. The committee's aim is to lay down those rules and teachings the following of which is deemed favorable to the moral development of mankind. The society, of which we will treat in a special article in a future number, is not confined to France, but has its representativs and adherents in almost all countries where Freethinkers liv.

Things look a little brighter in Austro-Hungary, where E. Schwelba edits the Lichtfreund, the only Antichristian paper existing there. The vigorous propaganda by him and his followers has at last awakened the government to recognize the fact that not all Austrians and Hungarians are superstitious, and a law granting liberty of worship or no worship will soon be asked of the chambers by the minister of church and education.

The death of Charles Bradlaugh has excited wide comment, not alone in journals printed in the English language but also in the Freethought magazines and journals of continental Europe. All writers agree in paying well-merited tribute to the deceased's high character as a man, and to his services to workingmen and especially to the spread of Freethought in the British empire. From Sweden, Spain, Holland, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria, and Venezuela the voice of praise and sorrow is heard. Certainly a man so widely known, honored, and missed cannot hav lived in vain.

A late number of La Reforma, the official paper of the Italian government, publishes an interesting piece of news, which we hav in vain sought for in Catholic papers, although it refers to his holiness at the Vatican. Government lawyers hav discovered and furnished incontrovertible proof in support of the truth of the assertion that the testament of the late Cardinal Consalvi was falsified in favor of the papal chair. And while millions of dollars hav thus been turned over to the pope, several of the rightful heirs hav died as paupers in poorhouses and hospitals erected in glorification of Roman Catholic benevolence by money stolen from them. The government demands restitution.

What Is the Difference?

The Russian government, desirous of an excuse for closing Polish Roman Catholic churches, has been forbidding the repair of these buildings, and has shut up a considerable number of them, on the ground that they are unsafe.

Congress has power to revoke the charter of the church of Jesus Christ, of Latter Day Saints, in the territory of Utah.

Congress and the courts hav the power to cause the property of the said corporation to be seized, and taken possession of, and held for final proper disposition.

The act limiting the amount of real estate which could be held by a religious corporation in a territory and forfeiting to the United States real estate held contrary thereto was a valid exercise of Congressional power.

What is there in common between free America and despotic Russia? To an unbiased observer, the answer would seem to be, a considerable amount of civil and religious tyranny. Petitions hav been sent to the secretary of state from all parts of this country urging him to protest against the action of the Russian government against the Jews. Whether petitions were circulated in Russia urging that government to protest against our treatment of the Mormons I do not know. Inasmuch as the measures adopted here against the Mormons hav been severe enough to cause many of them to migrate, such a protest from Russia would not be more inconsistent than the one urged upon our secretary of state. Classification and recognition are mental operations which people in general hav not yet become very adept in performing. The popular notion of a tyrannous act seems to be one that is performed by a tyrant; the government of Russia is tyrannous, and the government of the United States is free; hence the acts of the former are tyrannous; while essentially the same acts, if committed by the latter, are the reverse.—To Day.

Cardinal Fallacies of the "Cardinal Fallacies of Gnosticism."

THE TRUTH SEEKER in its last two numbers, of February 14th and 21st, published two verbose articles under the heading of "Cardinal Fallacies of Gnosticism," signed, W. W. Carrington.

Since these articles purport nothing less than the summary overthrow of Deism by the means of metaphysical arguments on the one hand, and vindicate "Agnosticism" on the other; the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav the kindness to allow me to make a few remarks on them in order that I might reduce them to their proper measure and place them where they belong.

The essay in question is itself a tissue of "Cardinal Fallacies" and such other frailties as might mislead bona fide Infidels, providing they were able to fish out some meaning from that cataract of phrases and words. We divide these "Cardinal Fallacies" of the "Cardinal Fallacies" into two groups: A, formal mistakes, and B, object mistakes.

A.—FORMAL MISTAKES.

This class will contain the errors of the author which he commits against terms and against methods (Dialectics and Methodology).

1. Gnosticism—Agnosticism: It is a "petitio principii" to call Christian Trinitarians "Gnostics," if not a downright "argumentum ad hominem;" not only because the sect of that name does not exist in our days and the idea itself has been repudiated by the church; but mainly for the reason that Christian philosophy abhors the imputation. Christian philosophy does not claim to know God. On the contrary, the Scholastics teach that God's existence cannot be demonstrated by arguments a priori, it must be proved a posteriori. They say with St. Augustin that they know better what God is not than what he is. If the author does not know this, he labors under "ignoratio elenchi;" if he does know and still calls his adversaries by a nickname, his action is not dignified. Agnostic is not yet a scientifically accepted term. But if it means what its etymology hints at, "one who knows not" (viz., things "supernatural"), the author still commits two serious mistakes when he makes the "Gnostic" define the Agnostic as "one who professes to know nothing," and in the Agnostic's own definition, "one who believes the human mind to be incapable of absolute knowledge." In the former, those who know nothing are certainly not claimed by the Agnostics; in the latter the author kills the Agnostics by simply identifying them with Pyrrhonians, according to whom nothing can be known except the one proposition that "nothing can be known." That Agnostics are not identical with Pyrrhonians we know well enough.

2. "Unadulterated logic"—"metaphysical mud:" One who reads the author's essay must be misled by the supposition that it is a logical treatis, whereas it is not. The appeal to logic, on at least three occasions, is vain and erroneous. He means sound reasoning, that is, not contrary to the laws of syllogism. We know not what "adulterated" or "unadulterated" logic is; we know that logic is the science and art of thinking; that is, a course of rules for terms, propositions, syllogisms, definitions, etc. There is no arguing in logic about supernatural or self-transcendent. The arguing part of philosophy is metaphysics, which comprises ontology, cosmology, anthropology, psychology, physiology, Jus Naturæ, Ethica Naturalis, or ethics and esthetics. It is equally vain to speak of "premises" and "conclusions;" since such premises are not made, no middle terms employed, therefore no conclusion can take place. "Metaphysical mud" is an unworthy expression. All modern as well as ancient philosophy is "metaphysics," and the term is only denounced by those who hav had no training in it. What are the works of Herbert Spencer but metaphysics? So are the author's articles.

3. Transpire is a linguistical mistake, committed by all who are unfamiliar with English etymology. "Transpire" means to leak through, from trans, through, and spiro, spirare-vi-tum, to breathe, blow (wind), like wind blowing through canvas; and it is employed of secrets which leak out through indiscreet tattle. Hence it can never signify to occur or to happen, in which meaning the author uses it.

As to methodology the chief faults of the essay are the total absence of method; the lack of definitions of the terms employed; the bewildering shower of superfluous words, which circumstance engenders confusion, and renders the essay unintelligible and unreadable.

B.—OBJECT MISTAKES.

Mr. W. W. Carrington's "Cardinal Fallacies of Gnosticism" fills eight columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is divided into three parts, viz.:

"First Fallacy: Literal Omnipotence."

"Second Fallacy: Co-existing Omnipotence and Volition."

"Third Fallacy: Human Certainty."

This third part is followed by "Remarks." While the "Second Fallacy" is uselessly interrupted by a heading, "Is the Logic Evadible?" the "Remarks" are made to swallow up an independent treatis concerning "Sin," which ought to hav been the "Conclusion" or the "Corollarium," as the result of the argument.

Let us now trim the thicket of the fallacious "Fallacies" and proceed to reduce it to its essence. As we stated above, the "Fallacies" pretends to overthrow the credibility of the existence of a God, and for this purpose it assails two of God's attributes, and the authority of reason.

An ignoratio elenchi underlies the entire treatis, or, as a plain English person would say, "You don't know what you are talking about."

CARDINAL FALLACIES OF THE "FIRST FALLACY."

1. "Literal Omnipotence." Under this head a heap of useless and meaningless words are piled up without definition of the terms, and questions without answer. "Literal (omnipotence)," "self-transcendency," "what is impossible?" "transcending cause," "potential question," "what is transcendency?" etc., are partly useless, partly meaningless bombast.

If the author were an adept in philosophy, he would know that all his questions were thrashed out over and over again for seven hundred years, until the Scholastics buried them for good. He would also know why these questions were buried never to rise again in the minds of metaphysicians or experts in philosophy. Let us explain it.

What is "omnipotence?" Omnipotence is an attribute of power to perform all possible deeds.

What is "possible," or "possibility?" Possibility is the freedom from contradiction in the terms. Possibility is physical, moral, and logical. It is possible logically that Archimedes should lift the earth from out its orbit, but it is impossible physically. To murder and steal is possible both logically and physically, but it is impossible morally.

What, ther, is impossible logically? A proposition is logically impossible, whose terms contradict. Thus: + 4 and — 4 (plus four and minus four): one excludes the other, like wood-stone (wooden stone). Furthermore, two negativ propositions cannot admit any conclusion; thus: (1) no animal is stone; (2) no man is tree; what conclusion could be drawn from these? A thing logically impossible is called non ens (no being).

Now, if we apply these principles, so well known to logicians, the author's zeal to compel God to do what is a non ens, that is, a mere negation of possibility, is highly ridiculous.

2. What is "self-transcendency?" A term that would be better understood in English if called "self-overreaching;" in other words, it is a term asserting, say, that a thing is six feet high, yet it is also seven feet high at the same time. These are but blind gropings in the darkness. "Self" is one term, "transcendency" is another. Suppose "self" refers to "Peter," which term will include all properties of Peter. To "transcend" means to mount over, or to top over; by this term we attribute more to Peter than "self (Peter)" actually meant; thus: the figure 4 is 5; which is contradiction = non ens. We might further add that Spencer's quoted words: "First cause must be total—absolute," are just as absurd as its "transcending the laws," but we must proceed.

CARDINAL FALLACY OF THE "SECOND FALLACY."

"Co existing omnipotence and volition"—a bombast, which, if tapped, will mean absolute predestination as opposed to human "free will." It is another of those dead and buried questions which are being dragged into existence by Calvinistic ignorance. Let us reduce it! All knowledge, all power, and will are three of the many attributes of God. These attributes are not different from the essence of God, that is, they are God, so that, according to Christian theology, God knows all things and God wills all things from all eternity, and things step out into existence from the state of possibility and virtuality in time and under the circumstances thus foreknown and thus forewilled by God. In other words, if I see a blind man approach a ditch I also see that he is blind, I also know that he will fall into it, yet my will is not its cause. God foresees and forewills not only that a man does or does not do a thing, but also that he does or neglects it by free will or by mistake. God's fore-will does not interfere with man's free will, because his fore-will is, that man should perform a thing freely.

CARDINAL FALLACY OF THE "THIRD FALLACY."

Human certainty. This question belongs to that part of logic which is called "Logica Critica," and it bears the title of "The Criterion of Truth," and not "Human Certainty." Just like the two others, this is also a dead and buried question; why should it be dragged before the public once more? The essence of it, in a nutshell, is this: We hav no ideas in mind except through our senses; but our senses are fallible, therefore our knowledge of things cannot be absolutely certain. In other words, judgments passed by reason are fallible; they cannot establish certainty. Reason is not the criterion of truth. Philosophers were working through the past centuries to establish the criterion of truth, until Cartesius passed his famous dictum as such criterion, "Cogito, ergo sum" (I think, therefore I exist); but his disciples soon found out its fallacy and retorted it, "Sum, ergo cogita" (I exist, therefore I think). Some Scholastics maintained that authority was the criterion of truth, as least so far as ethics were concerned; but this opinion was soon abandoned.

German thinkers hav cut this Gordian knot by distinguishing subjectiv certainty from the objectiv one. Reason is the criterion of subjectiv certainty. Objectiv certainty may not exist at all and is squarely denied by pessimistic philosophers, while all others allow that objectiv certainty is a matter of no importance, and is no more than if not existing. Example: A beautiful grove on the hillside with enchanting scenery, sweet perfume of flowers, delightful warbling of birds in the rising sun, etc., are things which the reasoning subject (man) perceives; he is conscious of them, therefore their existence is a subjectiv certainty. If there were no human (or reasoning) beings to become conscious of those same things—as we are not conscious of such or similar scenes on the planet Mars—they might be objectivly certain, yet they could not concern us; for the subject they do not exist.

Apply this reasoning and method to the "spiritual world" and you conclude that, if supernatural powers do exist (objectivly), they do not exist subjectivly, because reason, the criterion of subjectiv certainty, is not conscious of them, since no such powers are within the realm of subjectiv perception.

Criterion of Truth, therefore, is evidence.

Whether sin exists? depends on its definition. If sin be transgression of law, it does exist. Where there is no law, there is no sin. Few and easy laws mean few and slight sins (transgressions), and vice versa.

Therefore: 1. Omnipotence does not involve logical impossibility, consequently it is possible.

2. God's all-knowledge and his (hypothetical) will do not impair man's free will.

3. Self-transcendency is non ens.

4. Man has subjectiv certainty by his reason, the criterion of truth being evidence.

5. Sin exists where law is acknowledged.

Since these points are proved to be true, their opposits are fallacies.

"Not Too Much of This Good Thing"

Was the heading, in the Chicago Herald of February 22d, over the heading of an article referring to the entertainment and ball given by the Secular Mutual Improvement Society, in Princess Opera House, in honor of Washington's birthday. The first part of the program was a one act comedy, improved and adapted for the occasion by E. A. Stevens, entitled, "Too Much of a Good Thing." The characters were all well rendered by the participants, the Herald according them all justly merited praise, and the Chicago Tribune declaring that the performance reflected the greatest credit on all the performers. Following is the cast:

CHARACTERS.

MRS. PERKINS	Miss Frankie Prentice.
MR. PERKINS	Mr. Geo. Borst.
HATTIE PERKINS	Miss Hattie Coleman.
NELLIE PERKINS	Miss Dora Schoefthaler.
EUNICE BOWLES	Miss Grace Stiles.
JENNIE COWPER	Miss Nellie Ripley.
TOM PERKINS	Mr. Louis Harris.
FRED SCHUYLER	Mr. Jno. Stiles.
POLLY	Miss Lizzie Prentice.

As "Tom Perkins," Mr. Louis Harris was a revelation to most people, few being aware that he was a natural-born genius, excelling as a comedian many professionals of to-day.

Miss Grace Stiles and Miss Frankie Prentice deserve special mention for the ease and naturalness with which they sustained their parts.

The young coxcomb, "Mr. Schuyler," was cleverly presented by young Mr. Stiles. In the play was introduced a duet by Dora Schoefthaler and Grace Stiles, "Beautiful Sea," in which their voices blended charmingly. Miss M. Harris performed the accompaniment. "Tom Perkins" sang an Irish character song which brought down the house.

After the play, the floor was cleared for dancing, and a most enjoyable affair it was, as some of the old and honored friends of the cause, men of wealth and influence, lent their presence on this occasion, who hav not been present for a couple of years.

The supper was both excellent in quality and service.

The Secular Mutual Improvement Society withdrew from all connection with the Chicago Secular Union some time ago, and since that hav maintained an entirely independent organization, prospering far beyond their expectations.

So far from the Bible containing a true record of the events it professes to narrate, a careful consideration of its contents shows that it is inaccurate in its science, false in its history, and bad in its morality. —Arthur B. Moss.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the prices named.

The "Captains of Industry," second series, is now out. It is a book for young Americans, and its object is to hold up brilliant and worthy examples for the youth of the country to follow. And when we add that James Parton is the writer nothing more need be said of its intrinsic merit. Mr. Parton is the best biographer that we know anything about. His "Life of Voltaire" cannot be matched in the field of biography for its grace and frankness of style. It is at once history and biography, and is as melodious as a poem. The sketches in the "Captains of Industry" series are written in the same easy way. They are of men for whom Mr. Parton entertains a personal affection, and through whose example he hopes the young men of to-day may be lifted out of poverty. There is a romance about their careers which acts as an incentiv upon the reader, who will be loth to drop the book ere he has read clear to the end. We heartily commend it for all boys from ten to twenty years of age, and for their fathers. Price, $1 25.

Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker has published Count Leo Tolstoi's "Church and State," translating it directly from Tolstoi's manuscript. It was written several years ago, but he has thus far kept it in manuscript in consequence of the arbitrary régime existing in Russia. It is an assault upon both church and state from the standpoint of Christ's teachings. There are many good things in the title essay, but the standpoint assumed reduces its value to nineteenth century folks. The bulk of the book is an essay on "Money." Other subjects are: Man and Woman: Their Respectiv Functions; The Mother; A Second Supplement to the Kreutzer Sonata. Tolstoi is something like eighteen hundred years behind the times, and his philosophy is in keeping with the age in which he mentally livs. The book sells for 50 cents in cloth; 25 cents in paper.

There seems to be a fad nowadays for writing novels which shall, while amusing, also preach heresy, social or religious. Several of these hav been sent to us, but almost without exception they are neither good novels nor good sermons. Mr. Thompson in his recent work on the "Philosophy of Fiction" has explained why this is almost necessarily so, but with the cause we are not now concerned. The most brilliant exception to this sweeping rule is a work called "Jerome Leaster," by Lillian Sommers, writer of the book "For Her Daily Bread," to which Colonel Ingersoll wrote an introduction, and in grateful acknowledgment Miss Sommers dedicates this book to him, "who, unsolicited, stretched forth a helping hand when" she "most needed it." What raises "Jerome Leaster" above the multitude of preaching novels is that the sermonizing is skilfully concealed in working out the plot, which is that of an inventor whose home is ruined by the fanatical devotion of a wife to her holy Catholic religion. Like Dickens, in his works which swept away many abuses in England, Miss Sommers's characters are made real, and it is their lives, not their talk, which appeal to the reader. There is more than a touch in "Jerome Leaster" of the genius which shines in Olive Schreiner's "Story of an African Farm," and at the same time more of the conventional fiction style. The book will be promptly placed upon the Index Expurgatorius of the Roman church, for it damns her convent teaching and religious ecstasies to everlasting perdition. It is at once a warning against and a revealment of the power of religion; of its abuse by the church, and the hideous consequences too often following its complete possession of a sentimental but true woman. Every woman of culture who leans toward Romanism should read it. It carries a great lesson, and those not in danger will find it touch their sympathies tenderly but strongly. Lovers of good works will hold it as a book when loaned to be recovered and reperused. Price, $1.50.

"Almost Persuaded," by Will N. Harben, paper cover, 50 cents, is another of the preaching novels, but is not so much an exception to the general worthlessness of these works as "Jerome Leaster." But it is a hundredfold better than most of them, and makes for righteousness in a pathetically entertaining way, somewhat after the manner of the Unitarians and other good people who confound virtuous and charitable works with religion. There is, however, too much consideration of religion in it for a novel, and not sufficient for a polemical treatis. Stanley Clayton, the hero, is a skeptic. His father is a very orthodox Christian. His sweetheart is also a Christian. Henry Lawson, a young man employed by the elder Clayton to be a companion to Stanley, is of the same faith. Theology is considered in a series of conversations between the four, and the skeptic has no trouble in maintaining his ground. It requires, however, a very skilful novelist to sandwich didactics into a work of fiction, and where the novel proper is as skilfully done as in this case the average reader will skip the "preaching" pages and the desired effect is lost. Like the old farmer who reproached the boy that went down cellar to draw cider and returned with a pitcherful on which floated drops of candle grease, the average reader wants his "taller and cider sep'rate." Others who like them mixed will find this a fairly interesting work.

The passing wayfarer will be more startled by the title of the "Confessions of a Nun" than by its contents. "Sister Agatha" is the writer's convent name. It is a story of love and intrigue, spiced with what the book critics call realism, which means a hint of vice revealed in decorous phrase, and is the alleged experience of a young girl from her novitiate to her desertion of her religious life and her marriage. Incidentally several other nuns make confessions, and life in a convent is depicted as anything but the quiet, satisfactory existence the church teaches. The writer is something of a voluptuary in style and tries to giv those who expect racy reading in confessions of nuns as much of what they are after as he can for the money and keep clear of the law. The book will not be read by good Roman Catholics. Price, 50 cents.

Those who want a home-made Spiritualistic novel, after the style of Lois Waisbrooker's "Perfect Motherhood," will find one in Mary E. Buell's "The Sixth Sense, or Electricity." It is not, however, much of an exception to the novels heretofore spoken of. It is chiefly dialog, too long drawn out, much of it commonplace, and unless the worthiness of its object make amends for literary deficiencies it will never be regarded as an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Spiritualism. But as, possibly, we may be prejudiced against fictional and didactic mixtures, it is better to quote the description of the publishers, Messrs. Colby & Rich, of the Banner of Light. They say that it "is a new and pleasing story so interestingly told that each individual character of its dramatis personæ speedily comes to be regarded by the reader as a familiar acquaintance, and all of them as every-day associates. One of these possesses spiritual gifts, being both clairvoyant and clairaudient; and, added to these, a clear perception of the philosophy and phenomena of modern Spiritualism. In the course of the narrativ much is explained that is problematic to those newly investigating the subject, and in some instances to long-established Spiritualists." Those having more faith in their judgment than in ours will do well to send us $1.25 and receive a copy of the work. It is bound in cloth, 521 pages.

Austin Bierbower, who wrote so good a work on "The Virtues and Their Reasons," has now given us one on "The Socialism of Christ; or, the Attitude of Early Christians toward Modern Problems." Without considering the inconsequence of the inquiry Mr. Bierbower has entered upon, or what possible utility it can be to us of this day to know what a band of half-insane and altogether deluded people thought or said upon the stupendous problems which the twentieth century must solve or see Anarchy and tyranny enthroned in the world again, it may be said that in writing it the author of this book has done not a little to help the clergy out of the hole they are in. At present the "cloth" cannot preach Christianity and at the same time advocate the ultra views of the social reformers. This book will teach them how to do it. But at the same time they will hav to, as Mr. Bierbower has done, stretch the meaning of Christ's words beyond plausibility to show that he meant such deep and far-reaching Socialism and humanitarianism as our modern age is forced to consider. That the early Christians were Communists there is no question. But this idea was not entertained by Christ, as Mr. Bierbower by implication admits; only by his followers. Christ's ideas, as any fair reading of the evangelists will show, were bounded by his immediate present. He believed himself to be sent to manage things spiritually and to gather the people into his father's heaven. He did not believe his kingdom to be of this world, and his opposition to wealth was because the rich men were stiff-necked about receiving his doctrin, and he could not readily convert them. This close companionship with the poor was because he found them willing, as the poor and dissatisfied usually are, to receive a doctrin which promised them relief from toil, or at least a substantial reward therefor when they were translated. He played to the gallery because the orchestra chairs and boxes would not applaud him. His doctrin was, to suffer here for the sake of recompense hereafter; and it is just this miserable idea that holds the world back. It is also the idea of all religions, and is one very good reason why religion ought to be dethroned and the enthusiasm it evokes turned in some practical direction. Jesus ran away from the offer of an earthly kingship, however unable the offerers were to bestow it, showing that his reformatory zeal was all for the "spiritual" life. In this, as Mr. Bierbower concludes, he was imitated by his followers, who "veered from their original course," the later apostles not only acquiescing in but "upholding the social systems of the day, giving up their time entirely to the spiritual or moral." This seems to be regretted by Mr. Bierbower, but perhaps it was just as well. A polity founded upon the teachings of Jesus would suit very few but Reformed Presbyterians. The price of "Socialism of Christ" is $1.

Mr. Caleb S. Weeks sends us two works, one a five-cent tract, "The Philosophy of Evil: a New Gospel Lesson from the Apple-trees," and the other, "Selections from the Poets, With Responses" by himself. The first is a reverie coming to the poet when he sought the shades of Westchester after an unusually long spell of work pulling hard-bedded teeth (for be it known Dr. Weeks is a dentist, and that a good one). Under the apple-trees he lay and dreamed, and the wretchedness of the world flitted like a picture of despair across his vision. "The selfishness and nameless wrong which so greatly prevail, swaying individuals and society, producing great crops of misery, came to" his "recollection, and with it the fact that the same unhappy condition existed, differing only in degree, in all human society, not excepting the beautiful country around" him. But in nature he found a solace and a balm, and the apple-trees talked to him of better times, of prophecies of golden fruition of men's hopes. As the fragrant blossoms evolute into nourishing food, so should man's travail in this vale of woe finally cease and the period of ripening come to the race. Mr. Weeks listened, learned, and his "spirit expanded with gratitude to the divine Father and Mother." But he forgot the sour apples, and far be it from us to disturb his dream.

The Selections from the Poets is a more pretentious volume. The Introduction only will giv an adequate idea of its scope and purpose. He says:

"In reading the works of some of the poets who hav treated of nature and life, especially those who hav dealt with the moral aspects of these subjects, and while greatly interested in their flashes of genius and the glimpses of natural law which they revealed, I hav, nevertheless, seen some of their truths distorted, or so connected in statement with the pre-received errors as to seem to confirm the errors, while truths highly beautiful were left obscure, or failed to convey their full import, by the omission of important sides of the philosophy presented. Where the facts of outer life were seen, the vital principle—spiritual laws—underlying, overlapping, encircling, pervading, filling, and moving all, uniting nature in a co-working system, and making physical phenomena intelligible, were sometimes so enveloped by dogmatic mists that a blurred view was imparted even by the poetic inspirations. In these cases, as well as where the thought enlightened me, there would arise the desire to answer, to amplify, and bring out some of the antithetical or counterparting truths that the clearer light of our day affords. So I wrote Responses on the margins of the pages while reading, imitating the styles of the authors. Some of these I afterwards copied, enlarged, and placed in connection with the poems and passages responded to; and though I may lack the ability to perfect them poetically, yet, believing that some portions of our life's philosophy and laws are more fully and truly given in my Responses, I hav concluded to publish them.

"This statement I am aware does not show the modesty that authors are expected to exhibit, but it tells the motiv for my work, and it would be absurd to affect modesty while presuming to respond to some of our greatest poets.

"In some of my Responses I hav repeated thoughts uttered in others; for my purpose in this work is to put the corresponding idea in proximity with that which suggested it and to make the answer to each selection complete in itself.

"The selections occupy the even-numbered pages; the responses, the pages opposit."

Those who like Mr. Weeks's philosophy will find the corrections he has made to the poets quoted just to their taste. It is hard to distinguish some of them from the original, save by the sentiment expressed. Price, $1 25.

When Moses had written the five books of the Pentateuch, including a graphic account of his own funeral, he is generally thought to hav closed his literary labors. But somebody sends us the "Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses," just as though he was on better terms with the Hebrew lawgiver than the Jews themselvs. It is, however, not claimed that Moses wrote them, only that they are "taken from the Mosaic books of the Cabala and the Talmud, for the Good of Mankind." They are discourses on Magic and Spirit-Art, fanciful explanations of biblical incidents, and we fail to see wherein mankind is benefited by them.

Asa W. Brayton, of Glen's Falls, has written a little board-bound book on the "Origin of the Bible, in Prose and Rhyme, with Other Poems, both Religious and Domestic." Mr. Brayton is an irreligious person, but his poetry is of the home-made order. The book was probably published for his personal gratification and to circulate among his neighbors. We hope they will read it and become imbued with its author's Infidelity.

Mr. James Vick says, and we agree with him because he furnishes gratis seeds for the foreman's garden, the fruit whereof we expect to eat, that "no lover of a fine plant or garden can afford to be without a copy of Vick's Floral Guide for 1891. It is an elegant book of over one hundred pages 8¼ x 10½ inches, beautiful colored illustrations of Sunrise Amaranthus, Hydrangea, and Potatoes. Instructions for planting, cultivating, etc. Full list of everything that can be desired in the way of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, etc. Also full particulars regarding the cash prizes of $1,000 and $200. The novelties hav been tested and found worthy of cultivation. We hope it will be our good luck to see the Nellie Lewis Carnation and taste the Grand Rapids Lettuce. It costs nothing, because the ten cents you send for it can be deducted from the first order forwarded. We advise our friends to secure a copy of James Vick, Seedsman, Rochester, N. Y."

The March Arena opens with an essay by Prof. Alfred Hennequin, on "The Drama of the Future." Rev. Chas. F. Deems writes on "Evolution and Morality," taking the position maintained by conservativ orthodoxy. Prof. Joseph Rodes Buchanan contributes an essay on "Nationalization of the Land as First Presented." Rabbi Solomon Schindler discusses immigration. The Rev. Howard MacQueary writes on "Shelley the Skeptic." Albert Ross writes on "What is Immoral in Literature." C. Van D. Chenoweth contributes a paper on the discoveries being made by students of psychology. W. D. McCrackan writes on "The Swiss Referendum." Henry A. Hartt, M D., argues at length that drunkenness is a crime, and should be punished as such. The editor contributes short papers on "Home Influence and the Child," "An Object Lesson in Freedom," "Class Interests and the Rights of the People," and "Herbert Spencer's Arraignment of Class Medical Laws." Price, 50 cents.

Mr. S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., has printed in neat pamphlet form his individual experience as a child, a youth, and a man. To which he has added two of his articles originally published in this journal. Mr. Moore is one of the most zealous of Liberals and a man of shrewd common sense. Those who hav made his acquaintance at Liberal meetings will probably like his pamphlet as a reminder of a sterling worker in the cause, and Mr. Moore will probably send them one for 10 or 15 cents.

Ella E. Gibson has begun the publication of the Moralist at Barre, Mass. It is the organ of the Brotherhood of Moralists, and it is to be devoted "to scourging error, overcoming vice, harmonizing truths, enlisting the sympathies of the masses, inviting them to walk in the paths with us and be our companions over the dusky fortuitous road-bed of experience, aspiration, and determination; resolving, that as we see the truth we will obey its teachings and follow it to the end, be it proscription for opinion's sake, ostracism for our unpopularity, or derision for our attempt to lead society away from its antagonisms into the more congenial atmosphere of thought, reason, practicability, general good, and usefulness." Miss Gibson is a good writer and will undoubtedly make a good editor. The Moralist appears monthly at $1 per year.

Swedes, Danes, and Norwegians should send to N. S. Johnson, Sioux Falls, S. D., for a copy of his book entitled, "Is the Bible the Word of God?" Mr. A. Jacobson, who can read it, and is a man of good judgment, says: "It is a book that not one of all the priests of Christendom can refute, although they may be disposed to exhibit their ability to defame and slander; which, by the way, is the only method practicable for deceiving those who are behind the veil. All who examin the book critically, come to the conclusion that God never intended any man to write the Bible. How can anyone believe that God would so degrade himself as to blacken his own character in the manner shown in this book? There are many passages so obscene in the so-called word of God that even the most shameless priest would not dare to read them to the public. I do sincerely recommend the book to all those who would investigate and see for themselvs." We believe the price is 25 cents.

The publishers of her book say: "Helen Gardener, the author of 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?' corrects the impression that would naturally follow the reading of her frank story, that it had been prompted by Tolstoi's 'Kreutzer Sonata.' The manuscript for her story, it would seem, was in the hands of the publishers long before the first English version of the Russian book appeared, and was first intended as a serial story for the Arena. 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?' is enjoying a phenomenal sale. Although less than four months hav elapsed since it was brought out, four editions of five thousand copies each hav been issued."

"The True Theory of Christianity," by Andrew W. Madison, price 15 cents, to be had of A. C. Huene & Brother, 111 Broadway, Brooklyn, is not a book of much logical ability, dealing principally in assumptions about "things that men should know." The author is a Christian who is content to "know" there is a God, a heaven, a hell, a Holy Ghost, and a soul which is the real man. We think, however, with Artemas Ward, that it is better not to know so many things than to know so many things that are not so.

As the Philistines See It.

From the New York Herald.

Several months ago Colonel "Bob" Ingersoll delivered a lecture at Philadelphia for the benefit of Walt Whitman, the old poet and his work being the subject. It was an apology and defense as well as an eloquent and impassioned address, and being about equally characteristic of the subject and the speaker it caused a decided sensation in the audience, none of which accepted the whole of Whitman or Ingersoll. The lecture has just been printed in full, with the title, "Liberty in Literature." It is subdivided under heads, some of which are, "The Religion of the Body," "Humanity," and "What is Poetry?" A good portrait of the poet, by Gribayedoff, faces the title-page.

Different Methods of Literary Censors.

Mr. A. Comstock, the activ censor of literature, has made the annual report for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. In this report he relates he is occasionally applied to to act as censor of manuscripts as well as of printed matter. But he does not allow his office to be used to advertise salacious works, and takes much credit to himself for his virtuous ways. He relates one instance wherein he proves himself to be a worthy successor of his saintly namesake:

"A young woman in June last called at our office, saying she had written a book to advertise herself as an actress, intending to outrival Mrs. Langtry. She had taken her manuscript to a printer to hav it published, but because of its 'spicy character,' as she said, he refused to publish it, and referred her to our office. She proposed, as a matter of business, to pay us to allow her book to be issued. When shown the law, she proposed to strike out the unlawful matters, and then brazenly wanted to know if we would 'not attack her book just a little to make it sell.' Receiving a negativ reply, she then offered to pay liberally for this assistance, all of which was declined, and her book was not published."

Mr. Comstock proceeds, it seems, on different lines from those followed by Mr. Wanamaker, the postmaster-general, who has also set up as censor of literature. Mr. Wanamaker says in his last report that the thrifty bluster which publishers may make over books excluded from the mails can hav no effect upon his conduct. We call attention to his words:

"Some hav said that the exclusion of a book only draws attention to it and makes the damage caused by its sale the greater. That, as I conceive, is no affair of a sworn public official. Moreover, the 'advertising' which it is held the department gave the objectionable publication was entirely due to the thrifty bluster of the publisher who, however much he complained of the injustice of the decision of the department, never appealed to the postmaster-general to hav it reversed. The question is not pertinent, either, why the department does not exclude certain other publications from the mails which are admitted to be indecent. It treats these cases only as they are brought to its attention; and one complaint is considered as carefully as another."

Mr. Wanamaker affirms that he has no discretion in the matter, and is "obliged to act when applied to." Moreover, he treats cases as they are brought to his attention, "and one complaint is considered as carefully as another." In view of this positiv assertion we can but wait with patience for his decision on what we believe to be an important matter to which his attention was called four weeks ago by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who forwarded to him a book of which the subjoined is a copy of the title-page:

HOLY BIBLE,
CONTAINING THE
OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS:
TRANSLATED OUT OF
THE ORIGINAL TONGUES;
AND WITH THE FORMER TRANSLATIONS DILIGENTLY COMPARED AND REVISED.
NEW YORK:
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
INSTITUTED IN THE YEAR MDCCCXVI,
1890.

We had begun to think, as no decision on the book has as yet reached us, that perhaps Mr. Wanamaker does not always reply to letters sent him. But, on reading his report, and pondering upon the positiv statements made therein, we must conclude that he is considering the quality of the work sent him for his decision. This is well. The matter is of grave importance, and one that no honest literary censor would decide hastily. The book has a wide circulation, thousands of copies having been printed by the firm publishing it, and if it is to be suppressed a great number of people will be affected by the decision. On the other hand, the responsibility of permitting the mailing of a work of such a character is one that the honest censor will not lightly assume. There are several chapters and verses in the book which at a first glance seem to fall under the postmaster-general's definition of non-mailable print. They must seem to any honest censor "offensiv to modesty," and "tending to subvert respect for decency and morality," and therefore Mr. Wanamaker should not be hurried in making up his mind, however prompt Mr. Comstock may be when he is applied to by Christian editors or writers of spicy books. As a short horse is soon curried—so at least it is said—it may be that Mr. Comstock has a reason for a quick decision not possessed by Mr. Wanamaker.

On the New Tax Bill.

The members composing the Assembly committee of this state on Taxation and Retrenchment are F. P. Demarest, of Rockland; James L. Dempsey, of Oneida; C. W. Sutherland, of Kings; L. P. Gillette, of Niagara; William Ryan, of Westchester; S. J. Foley, of New York; George M. Beakes, of Sullivan; J. C. Keeler, of St. Lawrence; J. Aspinwall, of Kings; W. D. Stevenson, of Washington; and William Kennedy, of Onondaga county. They may be addressed at the Assembly chamber, Albany, N. Y.

This committee has before it a bill revising the tax laws of the state, but still exempting church property and property of ministers and priests to the extent of fifteen hundred dollars. As at first drawn the bill would tax parochial schools; but on protest of the Catholics, Mr. Dempsey, who introduced the measure, has assured the public that he has no desire to hit the Catholic church, and it is, therefore, probable that an amendment exempting parochial schools will be tacked to the bill.

We hav sent to the members of the committee copies of the speeches made before the Ways and Means Committee of a previous Assembly by T. B. Wakeman, Gilbert Hawes, and S. B. Duryea advocating the taxation of ecclesiastical property, and also written them letters calling attention to the need of equalizing taxation more than the bill now before them does. We think every Freethinker in the state should do the same. Letters should be sent also to every Assemblyman not in this committee by residents of each one's district. Vigorous communications to these gentlemen—the more the better—from their constituents protesting against the exemption of church property will acquaint them with the fact that there are some people in the state who want the tax laws revised fairly, and in the interests of the whole people. The exempt property in this state figures up an enormous sum. In 1886, when Messrs. Duryea, Wakeman, and Hawes were before the Ways and Means committee, Mr. Wakeman estimated that the church property actually in use in this state, and exempted, together with cemeteries and sectarian institutions, would amount to more than three hundred millions. Mr. Duryea went far beyond this, saying: "According to the report of the state board of assessors, it is estimated that the liberal exemptions of property consecrated to religious worship, to the uses of charity, and educational institutions of a private character, aggregate in value over five hundred millions of dollars, and a very large proportion of the property is held for speculativ purposes and not directly used for its ostensible object." At two per cent, a low average rate of taxation in this state, the amount given the churches, private schools, and charitable institutions in this manner is ten millions of dollars, saying nothing of the large gifts of cash made direct—in this county aggregating between one and two millions per annum! It is a burning shame and an outrageous swindle upon the people.

It may be that nothing can be done this session—indeed, it is hardly possible—but if a few thousand, or a few hundred, people will write their legislators protesting strongly against the swindle, the Solons will be set to thinking. The taxation question will not be finally disposed of this year, and it will be well to lay a foundation for future work. Freethinkers should also write to their local papers in this matter and agitate it unceasingly whenever opportunity occurs.

General Sherman's Views on Religion.

The Catholic Union and Times prints this dishonest paragraph:

"My father was baptized in the Catholic church, married in the Catholic church, and attended the Catholic church until the outbreak of the civil war. Since that time my father had not been a communicant, but he always said to me, 'If there's any true religion it is the Catholic religion.' Thus speaks General Sherman's oldest son, the Rev. Thomas Ewing Sherman. Surely this ought to settle dispute as to the religious convictions of the great commander."

It is somewhat difficult to tell just what this Jesuit priest did say about his father's belief at the time of his death, and it may be well to reprint what he wrote June 1, 1878, just before his departure to England to pursue the studies which hav made him so thoroughly a Jesuit. The letter was addressed to the Hon. Samuel Reber, and in it are these paragraphs:

"My father, as you know, is not a Catholic, and therefore the step I am taking seems as startling and as strange to him as, I hav no doubt, it does to you, my dear sir. I go without his approval, sanction, or consent; in fact, in direct opposition to his best wishes in my behalf. For he had formed other plans for me, which are now defeated, and had other hopes and expectations in my regard, which are necessarily dashed to the ground.

"Feeling painfully aware that I hav grieved and disappointed my father, I beg my friends and his, one and all, of whatever religion they may be, to spare him inquiries or comments of any sort, for I cannot help feeling that anything of the kind would be ill-timed and inappropriate."

On his son's action in taking orders General Sherman expressed his views pretty freely, according to a Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer:

"'Oh, yes, I am disappointed. I am more than that, I am angry; mad, very mad all over. Mrs. Sherman and I agreed to disagree on that question. I had no objections to the girls' being under their mother's influence, but I claimed the boys. Their mother was very devoted to her church, and I never interfered with her in that matter, but I believe that loyalty belongs to the government first. I do not want to say that a man cannot be a good American citizen and a loyal subject of the pope. If there ever should be an issue affecting the safety of American institutions in conflict with the supremacy of the Roman church, they will put the pope above the president. We may not see it, and some living today may. I believe that our Constitution, with the institutions which hav grown out of it, is the grandest heritage given to the human race. It is above creeds because it owes no allegiance to any power save God and the people. Man is instinctivly a religious animal, but an American does not want his religion mixed for him or filtered through somebody else as the custodian of his thoughts. That may do for the ignorant subjects of a foreign state, but it will not do for free-born, intelligent, self-confident American sovereigns—the people."

In an interview had with him by the same writer, when General Sherman was mentioned as a candidate for the presidency, he said:

"I was born a Catholic, and they say I cannot get out of the church. I am not a Catholic. I believe that death is the end of all. The spirit may go on, but that is only a matter of faith."

These statements ought to settle the question, but of course the Catholic journals will go on printing the lie that General Sherman lived and died a Roman Catholic and in the full communion of the Catholic church. It is a way that disreputable organization has of making history.

A Bradlaugh Memorial.

Following the example of American Freethinkers, who hav built a Paine Memorial Hall, our English brethren propose to raise a Freethought Hall and Institute in memory of Charles Bradlaugh, "whose name will thus be continuously associated with the spread and maintenance of those principles which were the inspiration of his life." The building of such an institution will, say the committee, afford the thousands of Freethinkers who are mourning the loss of their great leader, an opportunity to express their feelings of admiration, gratitude, and affection toward him.

The Hall when erected will hav to be held by trustees, personally, for the owners, as English law does not allow Infidels to hold property in the name of a society. This injustice was one which Mr. Bradlaugh intended to right, had he lived. But the funds can be held by the National Secular Society, or by the appointed treasurer on its behalf, until the project is ripe for execution; when the total amount will be invested in the Hall and Institute in the names of a sufficiently large number of elected persons, who will act as trustees for the Freethought party. Mr. G. W. Foote, president of the National Secular Society, is at the head of the movement to build the Hall, and has associated with him many prominent English Freethinkers. Mr. Robert Forder has been elected secretary of the committee.

The scheme is a good and feasible one. It will honor Mr. Bradlaugh as he would like to be honored, and the Hall will be invaluable to the Freethinkers of England. Mr. Bradlaugh's large and valuable library should be preserved intact until the building is finished, and then transferred to that as a legacy to his thousands of friends.

The Law and the Book.

While the Copyright bill was pending before the last Congress, Tiddy Witt Talmage, a notorious person of Brooklyn, sent the following telegram to a Senator and to a Representativ:

"In the name of religion I would ask that the conference committee on Copyright bill, when appointed, and if within its power, would so amend the bill as to allow the Bible in whatsoever language and from whatever land, to enter free. There should be no duty on the Bible, and it would be a glorious thing for our American Congress to set an example to the nations of the earth by placing the Bible on the free list."

There is a law authorizing and compelling the custom house authorities to destroy all books of an obscene character which lewd people import to this country. Instead of asking that the Bible be admitted duty free, the Brooklyn person should call the attention of Collector Erhardt to that law in connection with that book.

What monumental assurance the preachers do possess!

In the Golden State.

A bill passed by the California senate provides that "any person who for valuable consideration or promis of reward undertakes to predict to another the future, or reveal the past by means of cards, communications from the dead, examination of any part of the person of the dead or living, looking at the stars or heavens, or representations thereof, planets or other bodies, heavenly or otherwise, or by any means not natural, or who prints or causes to be printed, or exhibits any sign or symbol intended to induce others to hav their fortunes told, or the past revealed or future predicted, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

What do the California senators want—to hav their fortunes told for nothing?

We suggest that they now enact that any person who makes two bites of a cherry, or pays more than a bit for a drink, shall be hanged until he is dead and may God hav mercy on his soul.

There's nothing like protecting the dear people.

Editorial Notes.

SEATTLE, Wash., sends a petition against closing the World's Fair on Sundays just fourteen feet long. It is signed by business men who evidently know their business.

BY a vote of sixty to thirty-four the lower house of the Kansas legislature passed the following bill: "Section 1. That women twenty-one years old and possessing the other necessary qualifications of voters shall be entitled to vote at all general, special, and municipal elections in the state the same as men. Sec. 2. That women twenty-one years of age and possessing all the other necessary qualifications shall be allowed to be voted for and hold all state, county, municipal and township offices in the state." The bill was rejected by the senate, however. The Alliance legislators generally voted for it, and if that party ever captures both branches of the Kansas legislature the women of the state will get their rights.

THE Catholic Review thinks that "the treaty with Brazil recently made by Mr. Blaine, has a meaning for American Catholics which very few seem to understand. Commercial intercourse with Brazil means at no distant day social and intellectual reciprocity which must influence both countries to some degree, but Brazil in particular. The prominent ideas in our religious, intellectual, and political life are certain to find favor in the new republic and to hav many supporters. They will work their way into the life of the Catholic nation, as some of them hav already done; and free divorce, godless schools, Atheistic legislation of all kinds, will become noted in Brazil. The one good thing in the United States which might influence the Brazilians for good these poor people will never hear of, the Catholic body. That body has no means of making itself known outside of the United States, and what is worse, it cares very little about making itself known. It has no daily press and a very poor weekly press. For all it cares Brazil may turn Protestant, as surely will turn Atheistic under the new influence which will follow the current of trade."

THE general mean selfishness of church corporations is again shown in this city in connection with the proposed opening of Morningside avenue from 110th to 122d street. The property-owners on the west side of the avenue hav agreed to move their houses ten feet further back without expense to the city, but the trustees of the new Episcopal cathedral hav refused to agree to this. The church property extends along the avenue for three blocks. George M. Miller, on behalf of the trustees, said they needed no stoop line, and the trustees were very much opposed to giving the city ten feet of land along the entire line of their property for nothing. The board of street opening, however, thought that, as the property was exempt from taxation, the trustees should not exact pay for a strip of land the loss of which would result in improving their property. It will probably require legal force to compel the church trustees to consent.

IN the Progressive Age a writer on "Esthetic of Trees and Waters" asks: "Why are the Scotch noted the world over for their stern morality? Is it all due to her splendid schools? Ask her forests, her lakes, her highlands; they report how well the beautiful in nature wakes the moral and poetic ideals of the beautiful in social character." The question is as easily answered as was that of the boy who asked how it could be that a girl born of the same parents as himself could be no relation. The boy lied. The Scotch are logical theologians, stern parents, economical livers, and great fighters for their own liberty, but they are not filled with a "stern morality." Beware of a trading Scotchman as you would of a blarneying Irishman. The Scotch will hav their pound of flesh, blood and all. And in proportion to its population Calvinistic Scotland used to, and perhaps does now, giv to the world annually more illegitimate children than either Ireland or England. The religious customs of the land were responsible for this. The writer of "Esthetic," etc., is advised to read Saladin's "Woman." Its author is a Scotchman, and proud of it. There is nothing gained by holding wrong notions about races. Life on the rugged hills of Scotland makes Scotchmen defenders of freedom, but the Christian religion has made them immoral, as the word goes.

THE new state of Washington has got a Sunday law which some of the people do not like, and Senator Owings has proposed some amendments to it as follows:

"To amend sections 1,266 and 2,067, code of Washington, to prohibit the keeping open of certain places of business, and prohibiting certain acts to be done on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and to exempt incorporations and cities from the operation thereof.

"Be it enacted by the legislature as follows: No person shall keep open any playhouse or theater, race ground, cockpit, or play at any game of chance for gain, or engage in any noisy amusements, or keep open any drinking or billiard saloon, or sell or dispose of any intoxicating beverage on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday. Provided, that this section shall not apply to nor be enforced in any city now incorporated or which may hereafter become incorporated under the laws of the state of Washington.

"That section 2 067 of the code of the state of Washington be and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows: It shall be unlawful for any person or persons of this territory (state) to open on Sunday for the purpose of trade or sale of goods or merchandise, shop, store, or building, or place of business whatever. Provided, that this chapter shall not apply to hotels only in so far as the sale of intoxicating liquors is concerned, and shall not apply to drug stores, livery stables, or undertakers Provided further, that this section shall not apply to, or be enforced in any city not incorporated in the state of Washington."

The ministers of the state are circulating petitions against the amendments and preaching against the wicked senator. What the chances are for the adoption of the amendments, which practically repeal the law, we do not know. Probably Mr. Reynolds will soon be heard from on the subject.

THE Sacramento Bee prints the following incident occurring during the Sunday law discussion before a legislativ committee of that state. The Rev. Mr. Thompson is the Sabbath Union representativ. At the hearing Judge Carpenter questioned the constitutionality of a law that allows privileges to some that it denies to others. This remark stirred up the Reverend Thompson, who, in a sneering and insulting manner, retorted that he was amazed at the dense ignorance of a man who was called "judge," and who should raise such a question. Now, the veteran lawyer is anything but ignorant, and he is a bad man to trifle with, as Thompson subsequently discovered to his discomfiture. While the judge was leaving the capitol with some friends at the close of the committee meeting, Thompson, to Carpenter's amazement, approached, in a fresh and familiar way, and began to talk, at the same time taking the senator by the arm. The tall form of the old soldier was erect in a moment, and shaking off the preacher he turned upon him the withering power of his sarcasm. "If I were Jesus Christ and made a man a Christian," he exclaimed, "I'd make him a gentleman first, or I'd kill him!" Thompson's "cheek" came quickly to his rescue, and he asked to know what he had said that could be objected to. He got the information, and in a way that he will probably not forget. "You talked like a blackguard, sir," replied the senator, "and you ought to control that foul mouth of yours! You not only denounced the judges as ignorant, but the juries of the country as low and brutal." Thompson had enough, and as soon as he could, parted company and went his way.

MR. EDITOR: The "Liberty and Literature" is a very dainty specimen of press-work, etc., and the Whitman part is excellent. Very truly, F. M. MORRIS.

RUDD, WASH., Feb. 10, E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: I received the picture book all right and am highly pleased with it. It is at present making the rounds amongst my pious neighbors on a missionary expedition, which I hope may result in some converts to Liberalism and one or two new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully yours, RICHARD ROESIGER.

GOLDEN, IA., Feb. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $3 25 for renewal to your most excellent paper and for the ANNUAL.

Right you are on the field secretary business, and I hope your advice will be acted upon. There is a spirit of dogmatism manifested on the part of some Freethinkers which ill accords with their professions of Liberalism.

Yours, R. N. HOWE.

SALEM, ILL., Feb. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5.75 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth, and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1891. I am now in my fifty-fourth year, and there are no papers which giv me more solid comfort to read than the good old TRUTH SEEKER and that little noble and electric spark called the Ironclad Age.

Respectfully, S. S. S.

CHATHAM, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find check for $5; send one of Heston's picture books, cloth, $2 50, and an ALMANAC, twenty-five cents; pass the balance into the distribution fund. I think your remarks on the American Secular Union very timely and appropriate. The money would be best expended watching lawmakers and defending citizens against Christian fanatics in the courts. T. R. BURROWS.

SHERMAN, TEX., Feb. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Here are fifty cents in stamps, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months to George L Kolb. He never saw a Liberal paper, but he is bitterly opposed to the church and the Bible, and there is no doubt but he will continue with you. I go to Dallas, Tex., to-day, and Liberals desiring to make arrangements with me for lectures can address me there. DR. C. W. MCCORMICK.

MORGAN, TEX., Feb. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Your subscriber, Hirum Snodgrass, died Feb. 1, 1891. He died a strict Liberal; was conscious of the approach of death, but held his convictions to the last. He will be missed in this place. He was honest, sober, and Liberal; kind to his opponents, rarely giving offense to them. His wife is Christian and will not read THE TRUTH SEEKER; discontinue it. W. L. BATEMAN.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am now able to giv you that which I think will giv the readers of your paper in this vicinity much pleasure. J. E. Remsburg will be here Thursday, March 5, 1891, provided nothing interferes. "False Claims" I think will be used for his subject. I look forward to success, and will giv you a detailed account after the lecture.

I hav met a few who I think can be gathered in as subscribers, say five or six of us. Hav you any club rates?

W. P. LOCKLIN.

RIDGWAY, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad you hav brought the attention of the postmaster-general to the matter of allowing so obscene a book as the Bible to be transported in the mails, and that you press him for a decision in the last TRUTH SEEKER. I hope you will press in the same way for an answer as often as once in two weeks for some time yet, to call public attention to the matter. It is too much to expect that he will giv you a decision on the law and merits of your inquiry, as that is not the way the Christians treat inquiry after truth. GEO. L. PRATT.

GREENSBURGH, PA., Feb. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my subscription and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. THE TRUTH SEEKER is all O K yet. I wish I could only say as much for the American Secular Union. I think Mr. Westbrook would like it if we would all join the church. The secretary already has a very well-defined faith, and the president can quote scripture equal to a Talmage. He also says something about a cat in a meal-bag. Yes, I am very certain of it, and if the members of the Secular Union don't be very careful they will get their clothes spoiled badly. JOHN S. BYERS.

UNION CITY, MICH., Feb. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am sure you will accept the congratulations and the loud huzzas of the TRUTH SEEKER family for your open letter to Mr. Wanamaker. Never, though nearly sixty-seven years of age, hav I seen a more apt and opportune action performed than that of sending the open letter and that nasty book to the postmaster-general for his action. We want nothing so much as pure literature to purify such as were born nasty, and those that hav become nasty by Christian association, as well as those that are made nasty in the nasty Sunday-schools where the nasty stories in that nasty book are read to them by nasty teachers. The nastiness of that one book has polluted nearly all the literature in the land, and it is high time that this fountain of filth be excluded from the mails. The issue is made, and the eyes of the world are anxiously waiting to see if there is to be any discrimination made between the nastiness of Christians and non-Christians. Impartiality in the execution of all law, and justice in its administration, is all we ask and is the birthright of every citizen. J. GREIWITS.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Feb. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been interested in the discussion of the Secular Union affairs, and was especially delighted with what our friend Jamieson said. He spoke my sentiments exactly.

Our meetings here in our city flourish as usual, and seem to create a greater interest all the time. Other meetings hav started up here, conducted upon a similar plan. Our professional men and others hav always taken an interest and hav spoken for us whenever they could. We hav both radical and conservativ speakers, but that makes no difference as long as there is a discussion to follow the first speaker.

Respectfully yours, A. B. SEVERANCE.

CONCQUENESSING. PA., Feb. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to renew for two more years, as I think that is as long as I shall hav any earthly use for the paper, as my sight is getting very dim and I feel physically that the weight of years is slowly creeping upon me—though making my exit and shuffling off this mundane sphere givs me but little concern. And as regards this world, it will never be fit to liv in until all the superstitions are eradicated from the face of this earth. The worst enemies of man in this world are stalking abroad in purple and fine linen, faring sumptuously every day, and they are trying to feed the souls of a hungry multitude through an emptied stomach. A. CUTHBERT.

MARSHFIELD, ORE., Feb. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay for the champion advocator of truth, justice, and liberty. We in our struggles through life see so much of the opposit of these three great principles, it is too great a solace to the mind to do without the reading of the many able articles in your valuable paper in defense of these principles and dealing blows at the violators of them. I do not intend to do without the paper as long as I am possibly able to spare the money to pay for it—which is not always an easy matter, owing to the frequent violation of these principles by the powers that be. Wishing unbounded success to you and to the many brave and wise contributors of the paper, I am,

Very respectfully, W. A. GILMORE.

IOWA CITY, IA., Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of February 14th, on page 101, appears an article by J. H. Burnham, entitled, "The American Secular Union," the last column of which treats of political organization. I most heartily indorse his idea, and am of the opinion that we can accomplish more for the cause of Liberalism by calling a national convention in 1892 and adopting a platform broad enough for R. G. Ingersoll to stand upon, than by any other method. In this way we should better advertise our cause and get it before the people. Let our lecturers in the field take up the question and every activ as well as dormant member go and vote for our candidate to test our strength, regardless of old party affiliations. Hoping that this may bring out more and better suggestions, I am for progress and reform,

Yours truly, J. J. DIETZ

DALLAS, ORE, Feb. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3 25 for next year's subscription and for an ALMANAC. This letter will reach you, as the inclosed express money-order is of no value for a Jew postmaster. I lost several letters since holy Wanamaker had so many of his brother Jews installed as postmasters. If only a two-cent stamp is to be torn, a Jew is so smart as to know that fifty make a dollar. When I last year sent to you an order for subscription and ALMANAC, I mentioned some Jew doings. I did not get several TRUTH SEEKER papers, and a number afterward were a long time delayed. I had written to you that I would write more; you had that printed in the "Letters from Friends," so they had to punish me for it and then see what the next writing would be.

In the last paper, February 14th, I see W. L. Willis giving to the Moralists his knowledge of spirits. Once a medium came here. I went to see the fun. We formed a circle by joining hands—but not round a table—and she, the medium, feigned to sleep, and spoke many things that were not so. One of my neighbors had often jerkings in his hands, caused by nervousness and imagination; he would hav made nice rapping on a table. R. W. KIENTOFF.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Feb 24, E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: It has been quite a while since I hav written a line or so to your valuable paper, so I will drop you a few lines to let the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that I hav not forgotten the grand old TRUTH SEEKER or the cause of Liberalism. Notwithstanding my situation as a medical student and my severe application to my studies, I hav always found an opportunity to do something for the cause by helping to enlighten the minds of some of my youthful associates whose innocent minds had become entangled in the meshes of religious superstition. I am proud to say that I hav succeeded in Liberalizing more than a half dozen to such an extent that they look upon the Bible as an obscene book filled with lies and stories of cold-blooded murders and shameful debaucheries. Two or three are avowed Atheists.

I do delight to get a lot of Christians together and in an innocent manner hand them a Bible telling them that they should read it, and also tell them what portions of it they should read daily, praising their God with uplifted hands. It is effectual with a great many Protestants (Catholics claim not to believe the Protestant's Bible).

I hav been very sick for some time, but I did not send for a sky-pilot, while my physician was summoned in his stead.

I hope that every Liberal will exert his latent energies for the advancement of Freethought in the year 1891. Support our Liberal publications if you can do no more, and you may feel assured that you hav done something for the cause of Universal Mental Liberty. Do not be afraid of being called an Atheist. I am proud that I am one.

JOSEPH SHELHAM, PH.G.

NORTH BALTIMORE, O., Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: About the American Secular Union much has been said and written of late. I desire to add my opinion with others in regard to the matter. I am inclined to think it was a mistake when the name of the society was changed. The main object of the society should be Anti-christian—to be real truth seekers, even should we be able to extend our investigations into a future state of existence. The Secular part, the Nine Demands for separation of church and state, are minor and side issues—in fact almost a dead issue. The uniting of church and state is hardly possible at this day and age of the world. Our government is good, and will improve. The word progress is written on the wings of time. It is hardly possible that mankind will retrograde. I look upon the present society, controled by Dr. Westbrook, etc., as a mere side-show of one idea only. Let us form a society on a broader platform, as Liberals, truth seekers, or Antichristians, and do what we can to prevent any attempt to unite church and state. It is the opinion of the greatest and best men that this is the best government the sun ever shone upon, yet we find hundreds whining and complaining and finding fault because every man, woman, and child is not compelled to earn his daily bread by the constant sweat of his brow. And the man that earns fair wages to-day and spends the same for strong drink to-night howls to-morrow for increase of wages, or that the sober, frugal, and industrious husbandman may be compelled to divide his store or "capital" with him who has wasted his substance in riotous living. We ought to be consistent. We ought to hav national, state, and local societies; and to do so there must be laborers in the vineyard.

S. M. BOWER.

HIGHLANDS, N. J., Feb. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In as few lines as possible I wish to bring to the notice of brother Liberals the misfortune that has overtaken Capt. Wm. L. Johnson and family. Though poor, they are the stanchest supporters of Liberalism in this community. Diphtheria and scarlet fever hav for some time been on the rampage here, and it being in their family, they hav in consequence of their open rejection of Christianity been double sufferers. Notwithstanding the fact of their having the best medical aid available, death has robbed them of their brightest hope, in their youngest son, who, though young in years, was old in ideas and developed an interest in Freethought matters creditable to one double his years, showing clearly that no cobwebs of superstition obscured his view in what was best for his fellow-beings—truly an evidence that had he attained manhood the world would hav had another of those men (who, however, could not claim a harp and crown in heaven when life's work was at an end) in which it could rejoice and feel that it was better for their having lived. Owing to the fact of their having to confine themselvs to the attention of one another without any neighborly assistance, they hav been unable for a long time to ply the vocation upon which their livelihood depends, and in consequence hav become somewhat financially embarrassed. And the fact of Captain Johnson having always contributed largely and willingly in proportion to his means to every appeal put forth for the advancement and support of Liberalism and the Nine Demands, entitles him to more than a passing notice in his present troubles at the hands of us Liberals who wish to encourage Freethought and prove to our fellow-beings that a friend in need is the "God indeed." And for the furtherance of a small fund to alleviate in some respect his present distress, I inclose $1.

INFIDEL.

DES MOINES, IA., Jan. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send this obituary: Died, in Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 30, 1891, Prof. V. C. Taylor, aged seventy-four years. Professor Taylor was born in Barkhamstead, Conn., in the year 1817. At an early age he imbibed a taste for music, and to this his life was devoted. In his own line he probably had no superior and but few equals. His published musical works are as follows: "Sacred Minstrel," in 1846; "The Lute, or Musical Director," in 1847; "Choral Anthems," in 1850; "The Concordia," in 1851; "The Chime," in 1854; "The Celestina," in 1856. In addition to these he wrote two operas, "Elizabeth" and "Joseph." I think Professor Taylor was a Freethinker, and one of the most outspoken men that ever lived. Yet he was always courteous, and ever had a sincere respect for the honest opinion of anyone, whatever that opinion might be. Though a Spiritualist and devoutly attached to that philosophy, he was tolerant and charitable toward those who differed from him. He was an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and especially of the cartoons. When the picture book was issued he bought four copies to loan and circulate among his friends and thus spread the gospel of Freethought. Victor C. Taylor was one of the most generous and benevolent of men, and no man had more friends and fewer enemies than he whose death we all mourn. The funeral took place in the Unitarian church, of which he was for many years the musical director. Rev. Miss Hultin pronounced an eloquent funeral sermon, after which the remains were carried to their eternal resting-place in the peaceful shades of Greenwood cemetery. The world is better and grander for the fact that this good man has lived in it, and though dead he will liv forever in the hearts of those whose fortune it was to come in contact with his manly, tender, and noble soul. Farewell, dear friend, a long farewell.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

COLUMBUS, O., Feb. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50 for the "Pictorial Text-Book," as I must hav one to keep on the table so that anyone that comes in may see what we are, and perhaps it may be the means of leading somebody into the glorious path of Freethought. I sent my other "Pictorial Text-Book" to a comrade in England for a Christmas present. I was afraid it would not get through the mails, but it did. I hav since heard from him. He says it is simply grand, and he will never be tired of looking at it. I also sent him some of my old TRUTH SEEKERS. He thinks it is a grand paper, but thinks most credit due Brother Heston for the pictures, and hopes he will be spared many years to help the glorious cause—to which I heartily say amen.

I believe a Mr. Remsburg lectured here last Sunday afternoon and evening, and I am sorry to say I could not possibly be there, owing to my little girl being sick. It was very bad weather; it rained incessantly all the afternoon and evening, so that I do not expect there were many out. I think it a pity in a large city like this that the Freethinkers cannot meet together once in a while. If there are any that take THE TRUTH SEEKER and hav the time to spare, I would be only too glad for them to make a call on me. I am almost a stranger here, although I hav been here over two years. I never went to any of the churches, so you see I missed the great opportunity of making friends. My grandparents were strict Methodists. They said to me on leaving England, "Whatever you do, join a church of some kind, as it will save you from a thousand ills." I think the opposit myself, especially if one were to follow the example of some of God's dear people.

There hav been some letters on forming a secret organization. I think it a grand idea, as then there would be a bond between us drawing us closer together.

I see a brother in Kansas advocates joining the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union. I think that a good thing. I intend joining the Citizens' Alliance, for I believe that wherever you find a party pushing for genuin labor reforms there you find Freethinkers, and I believe we ought to go into them and do our level best to help them on, for if we want any obnoxious laws repealed it will be through the Labor party that we will get it done. If any brother sees this that attended the lectures of Brother Remsburg, will he kindly write to THE TRUTH SEEKER and say what kind of meeting he had? My only regret is that I could not hear him myself, as I hav never heard Freethought spoken by any one. All that I know about the subject is what I hav read.

Truly yours, J. H. WHITE.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Dear sir, you may remember that I hav at intervals sent communications to your paper, but I shall never be able to send another. For twenty-five years my only daughter was in the habit of writing my letters, or sometimes my husband would do it for me, but on the 13th of last August he was stricken with paralysis, losing the entire use of his left side. To add to my grief and trouble, my dear daughter died on the 10th of December. You may be sure that my cup of misery is full, for my husband is entirely helpless and will never be any better, though he may liv for months. It is impossible to form any idea as to the termination of such cases. My principal reason for writing to you is to urge you to call attention whenever and as often as you can to the great need which exists for mutual aid societies among Infidels. For more than fifty years, with small means and limited opportunity, I hav been doing all I possibly could for the extension of Freethought, and for that purpose hav sent hundreds of Liberal papers all over the country, and now when for days I see only my afflicted husband, my son, and the woman who assists me, I am forcibly reminded of the great need which exists for human sympathy, and think how very much worse it would be if, like some of our unfortunate brothers and sisters, we had not the means of helping ourselvs. The man who works ten hours a day year after year, no matter how industrious or economical he may be, cannot always save sufficient to support himself in case of sickness or misfortune, and an Infidel has less chance than men generally. He has no preacher or priest to recommend him if he gets out of a job, and as a rule he stands almost alone, with little that is hopeful to look forward too. When Edwin Forrest died he remembered the unfortunates of his own profession, but our rich Infidels seem to pay no attention to the unfortunates who hold similar opinions to themselvs, and when they die their wives get all the properties, to be spent in the follies of fashion or the furtherance of superstition. No poor Infidels are ever mentioned in their wills. Sometimes we are told of the Girard College, the Lick Observatory, and so forth, but if half that money had been spent in building plain, comfortable homes for Infidels who suffer through old age, sickness, misfortune, or on account of their unpopular opinions, it would hav been of more benefit to a great number of worthy individuals, and to the world at large, for there would not be so many men and women afraid of speaking their honest thoughts when they saw they were appreciated and not always to be ostracised.

RUTH BRETTELL.

Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am not dead, and do not want to die until I convert some more of my heathen neighbors. I call them heathens, as they represent that heathen's belief, Believe or be damned. And they teach it to their children. They plant the seed of hatred in the garden, the brain of their children, and in some cases it apparently would take the life of the child to pluck it out, and the older some of them get the worse it is to take away the superstitious beliefs—there would be nothing left but a pile of offal. I am doing all I can with my scanty means, and in this country cash is very scarce and the laboring masses hav found it out, and so has John J. Ingalls. They hav organized, and so must we, and we need literature for distribution.

I am tired of hearing so much about this field secretary business. There are some people so jealous they are afraid that some one will get a little notoriety, that's all. Stop it. Send out all that want to go, and giv all a chance. Send them out with plenty of cheap literature, and with books and lecturing they can organize and make it pay. As I said last season, let Heston get up a panorama, and a wayfaring man, although a fool, could not help doing good for our cause. Through our free school system people are getting more intelligent, and they naturally see the light easily. But the ignorant Christian cannot see and the hypocrit dare not acknowledge the light. As it is said, "The light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not." The Truth Seeker Company could afford to get up some panoramas, and it would, in my opinion, pay well, as it would talk if the man could not. He might know enough to distribute literature, sell books, get subscribers, and take up collections enough to meet all expenses as well as pay all hands. As Robert G. Ingersoll says about the miracles, giv us a little one, a very cheap one, just one, and we will believe, and try our hand without any salary. I hav circulated a few small dodgers that contained chapters and quotations, and I hav been told that it did more good than all the preachers in the country. They are reading their Bible. Some of the most intelligent hav left the church, and at their last revival of three weeks, with two or three preachers, they did not get one convert, thank the Lord, amen, notwithstanding that book of filth says a prophet is not without honor save in his own land. I am a poor writer and a worse talker, but giv me a good panorama and leaflets and some one to help organize, and Sam Jones's tabernacle must fall and all such foul-mouthed sky-pilots will see themselvs as intelligent people see them. Inclosed find circulars, and money for literature as named. I will send my subscription and others soon. Without THE TRUTH SEEKER I would be in a world full of trouble and nobody but ordinary men, but with it I am in heaven with good men and women.

KENT, O., Feb. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You are aware that a number of TRUTH SEEKERS are taken in our Secular Society here. I hand you a challenge by a Dr. Swarts, lecturing here. He edited the Mental Science Magazine, Chicago, but inclines toward our platform, and is to giv a lecture under the auspices of our society here. If it please you, we would like to see his challenge in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If any reverends come to time we will post you.

L. G. REID.

AN OPEN LETTER TO REV. MR. RIDDLE, PASTOR OF THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, KENT, O.

Rev. Mr. Riddle, Sir: As I came out of the post-office Saturday, you, Hon. Marvin Kent, and Rev. Mr. Richards stood in close conversation, your back toward me. As I passed you remarked, "The whole country is full of cranks," and turning you pointed toward me, remarking, "And there goes one of them." I replied, "A crank turns the machinery all the same." To this you said, "You don't use the right oil."

Regarding your first remark as slangy and inciting provocation, I passed on, reasoning to myself as follows: "I am as conscientious as he, I hav pursued my work here as my sense of duty has led, and 'with malice toward none, and charity for all,' I will still pursue it. I hav wronged no man, I pay my way with three dollars out to one in, I use neither wine, tobacco, or any harmful thing. I am under the American eagle and a Constitution of liberty in religion. I was led, a few years ago, by better views out of the ministry, renounced the dogmas, errors, and religious bigotry of failing orthodoxy. I am teaching truth, am opening eyes blinded by ignorance and religious error, and for this my duty toward multitudes of honest souls inquiring after better hopes than they get in the superstitions and husks of creeds, does my calm judgment tell me I must endure taunts, derision, wrongs, slights, and slang from the foam of incivility?" I may be "a crank" or what you mean by an ignorant person, and I neither do nor will use the "oil" of theology, but I prefer to allow an honest community to hear and judge as to the crank, and the oil. I now invite you, or any other orthodox minister, to a public discussion of any one, or all, of the following claims of your theology. The debate may be in Kent's Hall or the Opera House, and I will relieve you of all expenses. You may choose one or more judges, I an equal number, and they an additional one. If you do not accept the public discussion, will you choose a Kent, Cleveland, or an Akron newspaper and discuss the doctrins in it, you taking the lead, or else the defense? No personal flings need be used.

Orthodoxy teaches eternal punishment, also that heaven and hell are literal, fixed places, and that the dead go to these places. You may affirm, I will deny.

You may affirm that God and Satan mean literal personalities, and that they hav been seen, and will be seen as visible forms in eternity. I will deny.

You may affirm the inspiration of the Bible, or that it was dictated or written by anyone except men. I will deny. Still, I esteem the Bible for what it is, not for what priests say it is. You may affirm six days for creation; that God made the first human pair as Moses claimed, and that the fall of man had any reference to a personal devil, a literal garden, trees, or fruit. I will deny it all, arguing evolution and science only.

You may affirm the resurrection of the body, and that immortality means the meeting or reunion of visible forms after death. I will deny both, claiming that immortality is spiritual and not literal.

In support of our opposing claims, we may make free use of scripture, as well as reason, common sense, etc.

If you accept, be so kind as to inform me at once which subjects you choose, not delaying for the next issue of Kent papers. Time necessary for our preliminaries is passing. For truth's sake I hope you will accept.

Very respectfully, A. J. SWARTS, Ph.D., Scientist.

BELVEDERE, ILL., Feb. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There is no question that has ever been asked that has been attended with so much perplexity and been so unsatisfactorily answered as the grave question of the truth of the existence of a supreme being. It seems to be a problem that can never be solved. Yet it is a question that is of the utmost importance to man. It is a question that millions of people consider of the most serious nature—in truth, a question that is paramount to and above every other question, for upon it, they think, hinges every other question that pertains to the ultimate welfare and happiness of man. It is perfectly useless to discuss such questions as, Is there a hell? where is it? what kind of a one is it? how long will it endure? who will go there? is there a future state of bliss for man? or in short, is there another life for man or not? Every one of those questions most certainly hangs upon the first question, namely, does God exist? When our attention is called to the wonders of the universe and all of the various phenomena of nature, such as the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms of nature, the wondrous anatomy of man and the powers of his mind, we are asked, can we look on all those things and not be struck with evidence of a design, yes, evidence of an intellect and an intelligence in planning that is infinitly supreme? If our feeble mind is not able to grasp or able to reason out the matter from a Darwinian or any evolutionary standpoint and we yield our assent, and say in our heart: "There is a God, for as we cannot look on a watch and its evident design and not be convinced that it did not grow on a tree, but that there was a designer and a maker to it, so we cannot look on the wonders of nature and not be convinced but that there was also a designer and maker to it," then when in our helplessness we ask, Who is this designer? what is this designer? where is this designer?—then our difficulties and perplexities begin, for if in obedience to popular opinions we fly to the Bible for information and guidance, lo, we find ourselvs involved in mystery and confusion, being logically convinced that if there is a God he must be either somewhere, everywhere, or nowhere; somebody, everybody, or nobody; something, everything, or nothing. If we take the Bible as our platform, we must hold that God is something, somebody, and somewhere, and also that he is a person limited in parts, power, and knowledge. It teaches us that he is limited in parts by describing him as making man in his own image. It teaches us that he is limited in knowledge, by recounting his ignorance of the wickedness that was going on in Sodom and Gomorrah, save through a vague report that had reached him, to be positiv of which he had to come down himself so as to ascertain the truth of the report. It teaches us that he is limited in power, by his inability to drive certain tribes of Philistines out of Palestine because they had chariots of iron. Now, if superstition has not quite crushed our reasoning powers, it becomes evident to us that a God limited in parts, power, and knowledge, confined to locality, and subject to the powers and laws of nature, would not be a supreme being—in fact, would be no God at all. Finding it absolutely necessary, in order to make our God supreme, to abandon the literal reading of the Bible, we are compelled to maintain that he is everywhere. Our Methodist brethren and almost all of the orthodox sects hav been compelled to see the necessity of this now, although they still maintain that he is a person and could show his back parts to Moses; yet when occasion requires they will stretch him out so large that he can easily contain the whole of the infinit immensity of space. But when we assent to the view that he is everywhere, we discover that we hav got into a worse predicament than ever, for it logically follows that if God is everywhere then he must be everything and consequently everybody, since two things cannot possess one place at the same time. Then the whole universe is God, all nature is God. If there is a hell, it certainly has a locality, and as every locality is in the center of space, it follows that hell is in God. This is appalling, and some might say blasphemy, but it is a logical deduction of reason if God is everywhere and hell exists. But if to escape such a horrible and ridiculous position we claim that hell is a myth and assert that God is everywhere and everything and everybody, then we hav become Pantheists, which is next door to Atheists, for it follows that if God is everywhere, everything, and everybody, then God is simply another name for nature, and the astounding thought dawns on our mind that there is no God. This is a pretty predicament to get into just by yielding our assent at the first that there is a proof of a supreme mind as shown by the evidence of a design in the workings of nature. One way of escape from this predicament is to abandon reason altogether, shut our eyes, and blindly follow some one of the thousands of blind leaders of the blind who claim to know all about the facts of the case. But a more reasonable way is to take the scientific stand that matter and force are eternal, uncreatable, and indestructible; that there is no possibility of there ever having been a creator, and consequently there is none; but inasmuch as the power of the human mind is limited, since by no possibility can the finite grasp the infinit, it follows that there is no one capable of giving a just verdict for or against the question. But since, as has been shown, no matter what position a man may take in regard to a belief in God from a religious standpoint, if he reasons logically about it he will end in proving that there is none; and since, again, no matter what position a man may take from a scientific standpoint he will end if he reasons logically in proving the same thing—adding these two facts together, the mathematical conclusion is that there is no God. But, as has been said, there being a limit to the powers of the human brain, the modest philosopher is compelled to take the Agnostic's stand, that the assertion that there is no God cannot be absolutely proved. This is the position taken by your humble servant.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Sewing Song.

I hav a little servant
With a single eye;
She always does my bidding
Very faithfully;
But she eats me no meat,
And she drinks me no drink,
A very clever servant, as you well may think.

Another little servant
On my finger sits;
She's the one-eyed little servant
Very nearly fits;
But she eats me no meat,
And she drinks me no drink,
A very clever servant, as you well may think.

Now, one more little servant,
Through the single eye,
Does both the others' bidding
Very faithfully;
But she eats me no meat,
And she drinks me no drink,
A very clever servant, as you may well think.

A needle and a thimble,
And a spool of thread,
Without the fingers nimble,
And the knowing head,
They would never make out,
If they tried the whole day
To sew a square of patchwork, as you well may say.

Progressiv Good.

DEAR CHILDREN: After reading about the Sunday Club, Uncle Jack is about to submit a creation of his also. Let it be called Progressiv Good, till something better is offered. Let each and every boy and girl do some kind act to father, mother, brother, sister, or friends, something new, something to surprise and make them happier—do it without apparent effort; do not hint or mention about it, or make any reference, but be as sly as a fox. Do not state you are too young to do anything, but be sure to do something—a kind word—offer to help another—be well behaved, carefully address and reply; divide with your mate your apple or sweetmeat; defend the weak and rebuke the overbearing. Now comes something harder—tell the truth under any and all circumstances; confess wrong you hav done; still harder, hold your temper, forgiv a penitent, rebuke an insult without a blow, do it by silence or reason; do not wound another by harsh jokes or cutting words. Now, let us rate these as I hav written them, third, second, and first class, commencing at the simplest first. Every member of the Progressiv Good will, upon performance, put down the act, and what it consisted of, how performed and to whom, upon paper, but no names are signed or mentioned, only mother and father, etc. Acts may be stated thus: Arose promptly on the first call this morning, February 3d; helped brother fix his kite; went quickly on an errand, and returned promptly; gave half my apple to my mate; spoke no unkind word to-day, April 10th. Any number from six to twenty, or more, may be in the band.

The price of membership admittance will be the correct repeating of the form of affirmation; this, if you heed it, will inspire you to truthfulness. Be parliamentary. Hav your president, secretary, and collector, and they can be changed about among you, being honorary. They may be pleasantly conferred, with interesting preliminaries. The slips are gathered, classified, and reported, by their class and numbers, and totals, etc., and you will meet to classify and grade the acts. You may also sing, declaim, and hav arguments on the degrees of self-denial and forbearance required to perform truthfully any of the parts tested. The finest part of the enjoyment is in concealing each and every identity and under no consideration betray one another, or try to find who did this or that; claim nothing, nor admit nothing; by so doing you shut out selfishness and mutually share the feast.

In summing up reports, it may be thus (I omit headings and preliminaries):

Deeds of third class	60
Deeds of second class	30
Deeds of first class	10
Total	100
Argument
Question, etc
Conclusion, etc

Nothing is to be said about bad deeds; they die out wherever we plant and cultivate the good. And now, dear young truth seekers, awake and start; and I feel sure that the Editor will gladly insert your reports in the Corner.

Let us make a record in the Corner, one that will sparkle with truth for the grandest cause mankind has ever aspired to. Do not dispense with the third-class deeds; they are hard enough to commence on.

UNCLE JACK.

Correspondence.

CALDWELL, IDA., Feb. 15, 1891.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Friend: This is my first attempt to venture within the bounds of your acquaintance. I am from "away out West" in Idaho, "the gem of the mountains," and will say, all that is necessary to complete the "gem" would be a few "pearls of great price," such as yourself, Mrs. Krekel, and others. As this letter is intended for an introduction, I will make it such by telling you that I am a resident of Caldwell, a thriving little town of some six hundred inhabitants. It boasts of three churches. That sentence speaks for itself, for of course the church rules. Still, there is some hope that light will yet penetrate our midst, as the church only manages to drag along at a "shaky old gait" by the aid of those who enjoy church soup and godliness.

I imagin you are pretty well acquainted with me, so I will close in the hope that this letter will at least not receive a hearty welcome to the waste basket. I am,

Yours for liberty, LILLIAN POTTER.

WOODLAND, WASH., Feb. 9, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my third letter to the Children's Corner. I am fourteen years old to-day. I weigh one hundred and thirty-four pounds and am five feet five and one-half inches high. I am very large for my age. I hav a brother Henry who is one year and a half older than I am, and I am half a head taller than he is. We will soon leave Woodland for a small place named Nisqually City, near Tacoma, Wash., where we hav some lots. We will leave our farm where we hav resided ten years. Our farm of one hundred and twenty acres is on a hill overlooking the beautiful Columbia river; we can see St. Helena and Columbia City, two small places on the Oregon side of the river. We hav had a very nice winter, only having about half an inch of snow, and hav not had any frost to speak of but plenty of mud. The March flowers are all in bloom. I hav not been to school since last June, but I intend to start to school as soon after we hav moved as I can. There are more children writing to the Corner than formerly. I will hav to stop or my letter will go to that awful waste-basket. Wishing all the Liberals and truth seekers success, I remain,

Your truth-seeking friend,
ANNIE BALLHORN.

CAMERON, MO., Feb. 12, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Please excuse the liberty I hav taken in writing to you. As I hav never written a letter to the Children's Corner, I now take the opportunity of writing you a few lines. Father is about the only one that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER in this part of the country, though there is a great number of Freethinkers here. I would like it if we could hav a Liberal organization here of some kind. I cannot go to church and listen to a two hours' sermon when it is so near dinner time when the parson gets up.

I hav been expecting to see an account of the death of one of the oldest Freethinkers that ever lived in this part of the country. He died last month in his eightieth year, and he died without fear of the hereafter. He left a large family of "Infidels," as the good Christians call them, who continue taking THE TRUTH SEEKER. Well, as this is getting to be a long letter, I will hav to tell the object of my writing. I am now going to school at Cameron, and the professor told us, about two weeks ago, that he wanted us to find out James Russell Lowell's address. I hav asked two daily papers for the same and I hav not yet received an answer, and as you are always doing good work for the young folks, I hope you can giv some information about this great literary man.

Yours truly, HARRY C. LIVENGOOD.

[The address of James Russell Lowell is Deerfoot Farm, Southbridge, Mass.—ED. C. C.]

KENT, IA., Feb. 13, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and I must earnestly and sincerely say that you are editing one of the best children's pages that I ever saw. Oh, how I wish you may hav a long life, and that you may continue the good work of conducting the Children's Corner as now. Miss Wixon, the principal object of this short letter is to bring about a feeling of sympathy for those destitute people in the West. Now, could you set forth a plan by which there could be some means collected for the poor starving in and about the vicinity of southwest Nebraska? Could you not urge it upon your numerous correspondents to send in their mites, be they ever so little? The Christians are doing comparativly nothing for the drouth-stricken country, so it is left for Freethinkers to save them. It is estimated that at least six or eight hundred thousand dollars will hav to be raised for them between now and the time they can raise crops again. Now, please take this matter in hand and urge it strongly. A few of us made up $10 and sent it to them and got a receipt for the same. I come to you, dear Miss Wixon, for I know you hav so much influence. Please talk it to your numerous children to whom you send weekly communications.

Now, please insert this if you think proper, and perhaps you will hear from me again.

GEO. W. KEIM.

[We thank our friend for his kind wishes, and we will print in the Corner any plan he may formulate whereby aid can be extended to the sufferers in Nebraska, with whom we deeply sympathize.—ED. C. C.]

BANCROFT, S. D., Feb. 8, 1891

MISS WIXON: As our niece, who is also our adopted daughter, is writing to the Corner, I will add a few words to the children. Most of them, no doubt, hardly know how to appreciate the privileges they enjoy of having Liberal parents and being taught useful things instead of the old legends and ghost stories some of their parents were taught as truth. My own experience may not be uninteresting to them by way of contrast to their own lives.

I was brought up in the strictest orthodox way, and my childhood's days were darkened by such stories as the bears eating the children for laughing at the peculiar appearance of an old gentleman. But the story that made most impression on my mind was that of "that lake of fire and brimstone" where "the worm dieth not." Of course I could but believe that this was all true, but it was terrible to think that it was true. Although I was taught how to avoid the place, the remedy seemed to me to be worse than the disease.

But when the war of the Rebellion broke out I thought I saw my way out. We of the North were very sure the Lord was on our side. For why shouldn't we think so? Weren't we told so every "Sabbath day" by the minister, and on other days by everybody else? So I reasoned, if this was God's war, and if I should giv him a lift by fighting the South for him, he could not in honor send me to that lake of burning brimstone if I should be killed in battle, or if I should be so fortunate as to get through alive I could join the church and be saved anyway. But I found when I went there that the South were just as certain that God was on their side, and with as good reason So the true light of reason gradually dawned on my mind, and a glorious light it is. May the time come when all children will be permitted to walk in its light.

Your friend,
C. STRATTON.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 30. E M 291.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Kind Friend: The last Corner was a very interesting one; in fact, I believe that department of THE TRUTH SEEKER improves every week.

The poem by Mr. Homer A. Billings was read with much pleasure indeed. It is very interesting and contains some timely suggestions to parents who delight in stuffing the minds of their children with the dogmas of theology and the absurd stories of the Bible.

Mr. Conley has given us a graphic description of that cunning little animal, the coyota or prairie wolf, and I believe the readers of the Corner would be pleased to hear from him again.

There was only one thing lacking in the Corner, and that was an article from your pen. I hope to see one in the next. I know the young folks appreciate your writings. I do for one, and in saying this I believe I voice the sentiments of every young Freethinker who has had the opportunity of reading the productions of your pen.

Since I last wrote to you, that grim-visaged monster Death has taken from the grand army of Freethought a brave and tireless veteran. I refer to the lamented Mr. J. P. Mendum, whose death recently occurred at his home near Boston. In his death the Freethought cause has sustained a great loss. Peace to his memory!

I am attending school at present. Our teacher, Miss Mayfield, is a lady of more than ordinary intellectual ability, and you will not be surprised when I inform you that she is a Freethinker, for you know that when a woman possesses such reasoning power as Miss Mayfield really does she is sure to throw aside the dogmatic doctrin of theology, and step proudly out in the sunlight of truth and Universal Mental Liberty.

I hav just heard the news concerning the senatorial contest in this state, and I am somewhat disappointed at the result. My favorit candidate, Hon. John J. Ingalls, was defeated by Judge W. A. Peffer. Judge Peffer is, undoubtedly, an able man, but he will not distinguish himself in the United States Senate, as Ingalls did. The Atchinson Globe says: "The defeat of Mr. Ingalls is one of the marvelous things of the present time; that such a man should be defeated will prove a discouragement to men engaged in politics that they will not soon recover from. . . . He is one of the famous men of the nation; it is a shame that his own state did not appreciate him as he is appreciated elsewhere." The Globe is exactly right, and it is one of the papers in this state that has been faithful in its support of Ingalls, and it is one of the best papers in the state, too.

My father has lately received a copy of Mrs. Freeman's new publication, the Chicago Liberal, which I hav read, and I find it to be quite interesting. It is not a very large paper, but its letters, articles, editorials, etc., are of good quality. I wish it success.

Just as I was getting ready to close this letter, THE TRUTH SEEKER came, but as I hav not had time to read it, I cannot giv my opinion of the Corner this time. I hope you will push the project of a child's paper. I sent you my idea of the project some time ago, but I was almost ashamed to send it, as it was written in such a hurry. Wishing you and the Cornerites a happy and prosperous New Year, I remain,

Yours truly, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

SUGAR RUN, PA., Feb. 18, 1891.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: I think we young folks are getting very negligent in our writing to the Children's Corner. So I will make another effort in the way of writing for the same.

I take great pleasure in reading letters or short stories from the pen of George J. Remsburg, Leonora and Anna Stockinger, and many others.

We can by writing letters cultivate our minds and giv our opinions in regard to the belief we uphold.

When we first begin to write letters we can think of nothing to write, but as we continue it becomes not only an easy but a pleasant pastime.

I wonder how many of the children of the Corner hav read the Bible consecutivly. I must admit that I hav not. But I think that we had better all read it, and note down the good and the bad points, and then we shall be better qualified to argue with people on the subject.

I hav read many Liberal books, but I think that I will place Helen H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" at the head of the list. Her arguments are unanswerable. Everything is written in a way that makes one understand immediately that she is fully conversant with the subject dealt with.

Last week, for the first time in my life, I was in court as a witness, on a suit brought by a Miss Leggett, of my acquaintance, against a railroad company. She received very severe injuries. I was subpenaed by her counsel, and my testimony was important, as I was a passenger on the train on the night the young lady was injured. I was rather disgusted, when sworn, to hear that jumble about "answering to God on the great day." I think it unnecessary. It is enough to affirm that your evidence is "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

I hav a little incident to relate, which I think is very amusing, about a gentleman friend of my acquaintance. He was visiting at the residence of an uncle of mine, a Liberal. My uncle is a great admirer of the works of Thomas Paine. Several times he asked permission of his friend, who is a devout Christian, to read to him passages from Paine's "Age of Reason." His friend strongly insisted that he did not want to hear read any of the works of this silly and blasphemous author. My uncle of course did not read it aloud then. The next day he was reading, and said to his friend, "Mr. B——, I would like to read you some from this book" His friend did not object, and he read for some time. He finally concluded, saying, "Oh, that Beecher, what a wonderful man!" "Oh, yes," his friend said, "I know that writing must be from Beecher, as no other person can write like that." My uncle at last told him that he had been reading from Thomas Paine, at which Mr. B—— was greatly surprised.

We hav great fun at home playing "Bible Cards." There are one hundred cards, and five questions on each card, each one bearing the name of some Bible character. We hav played with our Christian friends, but their memory someway always leaves them at this particular time. Is not this strange? We seem to keep ours, though, and answer many of the questions.

I noticed in the "Letters from Friends" in the paper a letter from a Mr. R. R Jones, of East Randolph, N. Y. He stated that the Christians had been holding revival meetings at that place, and among the persons that joined the church was a very lovable young lady, and an artist of rare merit. Such is the case at Kinzua, a town some two miles distant from here, and her cousin, Ida Green, and several other children, hav joined the church.

If the weather had not been unfavorable, I should hav liked to go and witness these proceedings, as I think they will fast decrease when the truth is more widely scattered over the land.

Fearing my letter is getting too long for publication, I will close, with best wishes to the Children's Corner.

CANCER and Tumors CURED: no knife: book free. Drs. GRATIGNY & DIX, No. 163 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Write me if you want to know more about it.

Gems of Thought.

A BELIEF that all the atrocious cruelties of the Hebrew wars, which those barbarous Israelites endeavored to excuse themselvs for by attributing them to the command of God, were really sanctioned and ordered by a being of infinit perfection, is injurious to morals, and has been the warrant for untold butcheries committed during wars waged in the name of God. No one need hesitate to destroy that dogma through fear that the world will grow worse if its "restraint" is removed.—Robert C. Adams.

IF one can be good only in good company, and resolute only under favorable conditions, he is mostly outside of himself, his environment, instead of his character, actuating him. The independent man has worked up much of nature into his own being, and has the forces of activity within him to resist and to act, so that outside circumstance is comparativly weak. Instead of being the play of winds and waves, he moves against adverse forces, and is himself a power determining the current of surrounding events. There is a difference between guiding a vessel and being driven in it.—Bierbower.

THE ideas of the Bible writers are only incomplete intellectual phases, exemplifying the great law of evolution. The Bible writers were ignorant upon many matters upon which we hav now something approaching definit knowledge; the Bible cosmogony, its geology and biology, are quite valueless in view of our modern knowledge on these subjects; an impartial investigation of geology and paleontology reveals to us unmistakable evidence of the vast age of the earth and the great antiquity of the human race—an antiquity beside which the few thousand years claimed by the Bible writers sink into utter insignificance.—Arthur B. Moss.

I DREAM'D in a dream I saw a city invincible to the attacks of the whole of the rest of the earth,
I dream'd that was the new city of Friends,
Nothing was greater there than the quality of robust love, it led the rest,
It was seen every hour in the actions of the men of that city,
And in all their looks and words.
—Walt Whitman.

EDUCATIONAL ethics should fully recognize the rights of the body. We should admit the unorthodox, but also undeniable, truth that an upright and magnanimous disposition is a concomitant of bodily strength, while fickleness, duplicity, and querulous injustice are the characteristics of debility.—Felix L. Oswald in the Bible of Nature.

THE greater number of the books of the Bible are anonymous. No one knows who wrote them, and no one knows when they were written. They are, in the cases of the most important books, of those most relied on for doctrinal support, compilations from preëxisting records. But who wrote those records, and who made the compilations, are entirely unknown. When the books of the Old Testament came into use they were not considered inspired. That idea was an afterthought. And the Christian church places a higher value on some of the books than the original possessors or than Jesus himself did. In the same manner, when the books of the New Testament came into use they were not considered inspired or the word of God. Many gospels, epistles, and revelations, not now in use, were read in the churches in the early centuries. About the close of the second century or the beginning of the third, when the Catholic church was forming, a source of authority for appeal in case of dispute over new doctrins was necessary, and the fathers instituted the theory that certain books were inspired. But the books which they said were divine were not always the same books which we hav now. They declared many books to be inspired which we do not think to be; and they ignored and rejected many books which hav since been invested with divine honors. The contentions of the sects made it impossible for the new church to unite on the gospels which had been first in use, and they were, therefore, discarded, and our present four gospels were substituted. To giv them greater authority, the names of apostles who had been with Jesus were forged to them, literary forgery in those days not being considered a crime.—Keeler's Short History of the Bible.

SAINTLY LYING FOR THE GLORY OF GOD AND THE BENEFIT OF THE CHURCH.

Notes and Clippings.

HAIL and farewell to Minister Blair! And, wishes the World, may he hav a long and pleasant stay in China!

SENATOR CANTOR is after the Hebrew rabbis who hav been granting divorces at random in this city. He put in a bill last week to amend the Penal Code by providing that until a marriage is dissolved or annulled by a proper tribunal or court of competent jurisdiction, any person assuming to grant a divorce, or who shall declare a marriage dissolved, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Assemblyman Blumenthal put in the same bill in the house.

THE refusal of the English Parliament to remove Catholic disabilities is thus blamed by Catholics there: "The ministers know well that a Jew or an Atheist, or a Quaker or a Mohammedan, or a member of any of the comic little sects which British Protestantism has spawned, is quite eligible either as lord chancellor or lord lieutenant, but they vote down a bill . . . to remove the doubt whether Catholics are . . . eligible for these positions or not."

HERE is one of Dr. Miner's latest anecdotes: "A certain church people who wished some hymn-books, but had no means to buy them, found a friend in the manager of a large patent medicin firm. This manager wanted to get them up a hymn-book for nothing, provided some extra pages might be put in to be printed with his advertisments. It was agreed, for these sly people thought to themselvs, one can tear the advertising leaves out and then hav a good book. The Sunday came for the first use of the books in church. All the congregation was supplied, and every one sang; but this is what they sang:

"Hark the herald angels sing,
Struud's pills are just the thing;
Glorious Christ, so meek and mild,
Two for man and one for child."

THE Holy Synod of Russia has sent an address to Queen Victoria which is a paraphrase of the memorial of the lord mayor of London to the czar on the subject of the persecution of the Jews, except that for Jews the Roman Catholics of England and Ireland are substituted. The queen is begged by the Russian Synod to remove the yoke of exceptional and restrictiv laws which oppresses her Catholic subjects, "making them a pariah caste, degraded as if an accursed race." As the lord mayor said of the Russian Jews, these Catholics are described as serving in certain regiments beyond their due proportion, and yet forbidden the liberty of striving for the loftiest civil places. Russia is held up to England, as England was held up to Russia, as an example of religious toleration. "We who hav learned to tolerate all creeds," says the address, "beseech your majesty to order the repeal of those laws that afflict the Catholics," "the representativs of a creed which is the mother of our religion and yours."

IT was to be expected that the "cranks" would appear at an early stage to impress their views upon the managers of the World's Fair. A convention just held at Washington has resolved, first, that the Fair should not be opened on Sunday, and secondly, that no liquor should be sold in the buildings or on the grounds. As to the first of these propositions, it is to be assumed that the managers of the Fair are as well aware of the demands of enlightened public opinion as their volunteer advisers. The feeling in favor of the exclusivly religious observance of Sunday is much weaker in Chicago than it was at Philadelphia or than it is in any Eastern city, and local opinion will doubtless prevail with regard to this matter. The other requirement would banish from the Exposition all the European restaurants that proved so attractiv a feature at Philadelphia in 1876, and it is not in the least likely to be fulfilled by the managers at Chicago.—N. Y. Times.

THE "Legal Protectiv Association of Cigar Manufacturers of the City of New York and National Inquiry System" sat around five big tables at Delmonico's recently and ate its tenth anniversary dinner. There was present, among others, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, who responded to the unique toast, "Facts," with a very interesting speech. He said: "What would we all do if we had to stick to facts? How disagreeable life would be if everyone told the truth! Imagin yourself meeting a friend on the street and telling him that he was looking sickly, and that, by the way, you didn't care to hav him call at your house again. The truth is the weakest thing in the world. It always comes into the arena naked and there it meets a healthy young lie in complete armor and the result is that the truth gets licked. One good, solid lie will knock out a hundred truths. The history of the whole world is nothing but lies. Take the age of chivalry, that has fed and inflamed the imagination of mankind; that was the age of cowardice. There is a thousand times more courage in the world to-day than there was then, and yet the world is still on its knees worshiping those ironclad knights as if they were demigods. There was not then the love for human liberty that there is now. Those are facts. If all the books in the world except those that contained nothing but facts were destroyed there wouldn't be anything left but dictionaries and works on the multiplication table. The world is full of lies. For instance, you know as well as I do that a pure Havana cigar is a lie." This made the cigar manufacturers laugh at each other.

A DISPATCH from Boston says: "One of the most noted women in the world will soon be here in Boston. This is Annie Besant, who has a world-wide reputation as a social, religious, and political reformer. Her long association with Charles Bradlaugh in the English Secularist movement and her works upon social relations first brought her into prominence, and created a tremendous stir in Great Britain. Her work among the poor in London has endeared her to them and kept her also before the public. Recently she made a public avowal of her interest in the Theosophical Society and Mme. Blavatsky, following that by joining that society and taking the joint editorship of Lucifer, the London Theosophical magazine. She comes to Boston for the purpose of attending the annual convention of the American Section of the Theosophical Society, which is to be held here on April 26th, as the personal representativ of Mme. Blavatsky, and special delegate from the British Section of the society."

Mr. Conway's Mistakes About Paine.

An essay on American slavery appeared in the Pennsylvania Journal of March 8, 1775 signed "Justice and Humanity." Dr. Rush in a letter to James Cheetham, in 1809 says that the writer of that essay was Thomas Paine. Mr. Moncure D Conway discovered the paper in January last, and has partially reproduced it in an article published in the Nation, Feb. 26 1891.

There are several errors in the article which I am sorry to hav to notice.

"It will be observed," says Mr. Conway, "that Paine was at this time a devout Christian."

Doubtless the superficial observer, knowing little or nothing of Paine's life, would readily accept this inference from the argument in the essay, because it is partly based on the Bible and Christianity. But we hav ample proof that at this very time, 1775 Paine was as confirmed a skeptic as when he wrote his "Age of Reason" twenty years later.

In January, 1776 John Adams published a pamphlet entitled, "Thoughts on Government," and in a letter to Dr. Rush, April 12 1809, he says:

This pamphlet you know was very unpopular. No man attempted in the public papers to support it but yourself Mr Thomas Paine was so highly offended with it that he came to visit me at my chamber at Mrs Yard's, to remonstrate and even scold at me for it, which he did in very ungenteel terms. In return I only laughed heartily at him, and rallied him upon his grave argument from the Old Testament to prove that monarchy was unlawful in the sight of God. "Do you seriously believe, Paine," said I, "in that pious doctrin of yours?" This put him in good humor, and he laughed out. "The Old Testament!" said he, "I do not believe in the Old Testament. I hav had thoughts of publishing my sentiments of it, but upon deliberation I hav concluded to put that off till the latter part of life."

But further, Paine himself tells us in his "Age of Reason" that his skepticism began in childhood. He says:

I well remember when about seven or eight years of age hearing a sermon read by a relation of mine, who was a great devotee of the church, upon the subject of what is called "Redemption by the death of the son of God." After the sermon was ended, I went into the garden, and as I was going down the garden steps (for I perfectly recollect the spot) I revolted at the recollection of what I had heard, and thought to myself that it was making God almighty act like a passionate man, that killed his son when he could not revenge himself any other way, and as I was sure a man would be hanged that did such a thing, I could not see for what purpose they preached such sermons.

Another error of Mr. Conway is that the article on slavery published March 8 1775, was "Thomas Paine's First Essay." Such is the heading of the article in the Nation, and to make certain the writer's meaning I quote him, as follows:

What Paine told Dr Rush was, no doubt, that the anti-slavery essay was the first he had ever written or offered for publication.

There is no reason whatever to doubt Paine's statement that he had published nothing in England. The cause of America, he says, made him an author. It is nevertheless true that his earliest essay, which I hav just found, was a plea for the American slave.

Allowing it to be probable, as Mr. Conway supposes, that the essay on slavery was written a month earlier than the first of Paine's contributions to the Pennsylvania Magazine, can it be true that his "first essay ever written or offered for publication" was in December, 1774?

Aware of the existence of a printed essay by Paine in 1772 Mr. Conway attempts to reconcile the contradiction by saying in regard to "The Case of the Officers of Excise:"

This, however, though printed, was not published until 1793

In December, 1772 Paine wrote to Dr. Goldsmith:

Herewith I present you with the Case of the Officers of Excise. . . . I was advised to print 4000 copies; 3000 of which were subscribed for by the officers in general, and the remaining 1000 reserved for presents.

But this is not all in regard to earlier essays by Paine. I quote further from Mr. Conway's article:

One writer says his "Song on the Death of General Wolfe" was published in the Gentleman's Magazine, but though written at Lewes, England, it was first published in the Pennsylvania Magazine.

I turn to the "Miscellaneous Poems" in Mendum's edition of the "Works of Thomas Paine" and find the following note to the aforesaid verses:

This Song was written immediately after the death of General Wolfe. At this time a prize was offered for the best epitaph on the celebrated hero. Mr Paine entered the list among other competitors, but his matter growing too long for an epitaph, and assuming another shape, he entitled it an Ode and it was so published in the Gentleman's Magazine.

It was soon after set to music, became a popular song, and was sung by the Anacreonatic and other societies.

The death of General Wolfe was in September, 1759 At that time Paine was a master stay maker at Sandwich, where on the 27th of September he married Mary Lambert, daughter of an exciseman of that place. Paine did not become an excise man till 1764 and was not stationed at Lewes until 1768.

I now proceed to notice another error of Mr. Conway which concerns myself. He says:

Mr. W. H. Burr maintains that Paine, under the name of "Casca," wrote numbers of the English "Crisis" during the year 1775 beginning in April. This is disproved by the intrinsic evidence in Casca's essays that he was then in London, whereas Paine was certainly in America throughout 1775 editing the Pennsylvania Magazine. An interview with Rush in the latter part of March, and another with Dr. Franklin in October, are also on record.

The interview with Dr Rush in March, 1775 I do not doubt; but I do dispute the alleged interview with Dr. Franklin. Paine says in Crisis No. III:

In October 1775 Dr. Franklin proposed giving me such materials as were in his hands towards completing a history of the present transactions, and seemed desirous of having the first volume out the next Spring I had then formed the outlines of "Common Sense" and finished nearly the first part, and as I supposed the Doctor's design in getting out a history was to open the new year with a new system I expected to surprise him with a production on the subject much earlier than he thought of; and without informing him of what I was doing got it ready for the press as fast as I conveniently could, and sent him the first pamphlet that was printed off.

That proposal of Dr Franklin I claim was not made at an "interview" in Philadelphia, but in a letter to Paine in London.

And now let us consider Paine's connection with the Pennsylvania Magazine. While Mr. Conway was writing his article for the Nation, I was preparing a speech for a celebration of Paine's birthday, and I need only repeat a portion of my remarks as printed in the Ironclad Age of February 14th.

On the 4th of March, 1775, Paine wrote to Franklin in London:

Your countenancing me has obtained for me many friends and much reputation, for which please accept my sincere thanks. I hav been applied to by several gentlemen to instruct their sons on very advantageous terms to myself, and a printer and bookseller here, a man of reputation and property, Robert Aitkin, has lately attempted a magazine, but having little or no turn that way himself, he has applied to me for assistance. He had not above six hundred subscribers when I first assisted him. We hav now upwards of fifteen hundred, and daily increasing. I hav not entered into terms with him. This is only the second number. The first I was not concerned in.

The first number of the Pennsylvania Magazine was January. Paine tells Franklin that he was not concerned in the first. And yet in the first number there appeared several anonymous contributions which were undoubtedly written by Paine. One of these related to surveying and was signed "P." Another, describing a new electric machine, was signed "Atlanticus." A third one on the "Utility of Magazines," without signature, was probably written by Paine, and it is supposed that he may hav written or revised a brief "Introduction to the Pennsylvania Magazine" dated Jan 24.

The February number, which Paine says he was concerned in, has three articles believed to hav been written by him, to wit: "Useful and Entertaining Hints," by "Atlanticus;" "New Anecdotes of Alexander the Great," signed "Esop," and an unsigned poem entitled "Snowdrop and Critic."

The March number has an article on the "Life and Death of Lord Clive," unsigned, but credited to "Atlanticus" in Paine's works. And in the same number are two poems signed "Atlanticus," one on the "Death of Gen. Wolfe" and the other "A Tale of the Monk and the Jew."

In the Magazine for April I find but one probable contribution by Paine, namely "Cupid and Hymen," signed "Esop."

During all the rest of the year I discover only two contributions by Paine to the Magazine, to wit: two poems by "Atlanticus," both in the July number.

It appears, therefore, that all the editorial assistance rendered by Paine to the publisher of the Pennsylvania Magazine, was upon two or three of the earlier numbers.

It certainly ended by about the 1st of April; and for the sufficient reason that Paine was not there during all the rest of the year.

On the 21st of January, 1775, the first number of a weekly paper called The Crisis appeared in London The principal object of the publication was to oppose the British ministry in their conduct of affairs, especially in regard to America. The writers were anonymous and audacious. The leading article in the first number may hav been written by Paine, who was at that time in Philadelphia. At all events, a series of articles contributed to The Crisis by "Casca," beginning April 15 h and continuing for a year, were undoubtedly written by Paine.

About the time of the publication of the first letter of "Casca," April 15 1775 Paine was in London. What brought him there? Hostilities had begun in America, and the most pressing need of the colonies was gunpowder. This need was doubtless anticipated by Paine, who took his departure before the first bloodshed at Lexington, Apr. 19 1775. In October, 1775 Gen. Washington had penned up Gen. Howe in Boston, but dared not advance one step because he had not five rounds of powder. In December Dr. Franklin sent a letter to M Dumas, in France, by a Mr. Storey, inclosing £100 to defray expenses in procuring a shipment of small arms, ammunition, and saltpeter.

Previously in the same year Charles Biddle was sent to France to procure munitions of war, and in January, 1776 he returned with a cargo of saltpeter.

Hence I infer that Paine went first of all on a like mission in April, 1775 and returned by the 1st of January, 1776 ready to put to press his pamphlet, "Common Sense."

My discovery that "Casca" was Paine was made in Oct., 1880, and four days after that discovery I was happy to find that Librarian Spofford had anticipated me, his identification of the writer being based, however, not on the series of articles by "Casca," but on an extra number of The Crisis, published separately in a pamphlet and entitled "A Crisis Extraordinary." It was dated Aug. 9, and was all about Gen. Gage's proclamation of June 12 h in Boston. Taking a text from Horace, Projecit ampullas, the writer gave it a free translation thus:

> O souls, of slavery more than death afraid
> Gage wastes his pardons or his gasconade.

The earlier numbers of The Crisis were reprinted in American newspapers, and I hav here a reprint of the first twenty-eight numbers in a book, by John Anderson, New York, 1776.

I hav, furthermore, this advertisement, clipped from Holyoake's "Reasoner," March 25 1855:

Paine's Crisis 1775, . . . This rare book was ordered to be burned by the common hangman, in the Palace yard, Westminster.

Ten of these twenty-eight numbers are signed "Casca," and several more unsigned are undoubtedly his.

Who started the publication of The Crisis in London? Franklin had been insulted at court and was about to leave England forever. Already he had sent Paine to Philadelphia with letters of introduction. But he himself did not embark until three months after the first issue of The Crisis. Paine and Franklin were bosom-friends, and worked together even when far apart. Without their secret work American independence would not hav been achieved. Is it, therefore, any exaggeration to say that Paine and Franklin made this nation?

"Casca" was unknown to the publisher of The Crisis, and was in or about London from April or May till December, 1775 as appears by repeated references to the unknown contributor in the paper itself.

"Casca's" last communication was in the paper dated April 13 1776. The writer was then in America, and his "Common Sense" had gone through many editions.

The cause of America was the principal theme of "Casca." In his first letter, dated April 15, 1775, "Casca" says:

Hav the Americans ever yet been (though if men they shortly will be) in arms? Hav they yet had a prospect of any other terms than such as would make them slaves? . . . They are not destitute of arms already, and they will be supplied with more in spite of our vigilant fleet.

Four days after the date of this letter, or rather of The Crisis containing it, the massacre at Lexington occurred.

In "Casca's" letter on May 6, 1775, he says, addressing Dr. Johnson:

I once more call America a nation, and a great nation. Too far distant from the mother country to receive from her either immediate or timely assistance on any sudden foreign attack, she must in such a case find succor within herself or perish.

In Paine's "Common Sense" we find the same sentiment elaborated; and in "Casca's" next paragraph the words "common sense" occur, as if foreshadowing his work in America.

If unwarrantable oppression may be resisted upon revolution principles, the tie between England and America is actually dissolved, our protection is withdrawn, our tyrannic sword unsheathed, and common sense proclaims aloud that obedience in America is no more.

"Casca," being in England at this time, had not yet heard of the battle of Lexington, and Paine in his "Common Sense" says:

No man was a warmer wisher for a reconciliation than myself, before the fatal 19 h of April, 1775.

But the subsequent letters of "Casca" all breathe the spirit of American independence.

The Crisis of June, 1775 contains a letter "To the King," which, though unsigned, was doubtless written by "Casca." This was just after the news of the massacre at Lexington had reached England. I quote the first paragraph:

Sir: Like that fell monster and infernal tyrant, Charles the First, you are determined to deluge the land with innocent blood. Fired with rage at the more than savage barbarity of your mercenary troops, your cursed instruments of slaughter in America, I can no longer keep within the bounds of decency. The breast of every true Englishman must be filled with indignation, and that respect which is due to a king will be lost in a noble zeal for the preservation of our country and fellow-subjects.

The publication of The Crisis in England ceased after the Declaration of Independence in 1776.

On the 23d of December, 1776, a little pamphlet was printed in America called "The Crisis," by "Common Sense," written upon a drumhead by Thomas Paine, a private in General Washington's army.

To the foregoing facts and arguments I will now add:

1 That the work of editing the Pennsylvania Magazine was next to nothing, the only article of an editorial nature being the brief introduction to the first number, which Paine says he was not concerned in.

2 That Paine's own contributions were undoubtedly gratuitous, it being an unswerving principle with him to take no pay for and make no profit from his literary work.

3 That the assistance rendered by him was probably canvassing for subscribers, the number of whom, he says, had risen from six hundred to fifteen hundred since he first assisted the publisher, and was daily increasing. For this work, even before entering into terms with Mr. Aitkin, he would be entitled to a commission; and the pay would come as fast as the money was collected. Consequently the publisher's book would show (as indeed I am informed it does) payments made to Thomas Paine all through the year 1775 In his absence they would of course be received by his authorized agent or substitute.

4 But whatever engagement Paine may hav made with the publisher his sudden departure from this country was a thing he would strive to keep as secret as possible; and if, as was quite likely, Robert Aitkin was a Scotch Tory, Paine would hav had the strongest motiv to hoodwink him with the understanding that he would soon return and attend to his work in person.

And now in conclusion, Mr. Conway will remember that before his article appeared in the Nation I warned him against committing errors in writing a life of Paine, and that he cheerfully invited my criticism. I am sorry to find so many errors in the article reviewed, and hope they will be fewer in the forthcoming biography. W. H. Burr.

Recent Gems from the Religious Press.

The Independent of the 12 th inst. in its leading article on the "Logic of Miracles," says in substance:

The Christian church cannot move a single step toward the exclusion of supernaturalism from the Bible without taking from it its divine authority, and sinking it to the common level of other books. The "Thus saith the Lord" is gone and all that remains is the Thus saith man.

As well may we speak of the dryness of water, the sunlight of the evening, the impartiality of human justice, or the humanity of Jay Gould as speak soberly of the "Logic of Miracles." Logic is defined as the science of the laws of thought, and thought finds its logical limitation within the natural environment in which man finds himself. The moment thought seeks to transcend this limitation that moment it becomes vague and illogical and woefully lacking of a basic principle. To ascribe the origin of ancient miracles to a God or Gods is still more illogical, from the fact that the origin of the God or Gods themselvs is vailed in a mystery which is the direct antithesis of logical thought.

The fact is that this manufactured exhibit marked A 1 is composed of most delicate materials, and although it is called God almighty and said to be all powerful, etc., yet its keepers are terribly nervous and yell at the top of their voices at the mere shadow of the approach of reason with a stick in its hand, for fear that an inquisitorial punch in the ribs may produce its utter collapse into crumbling ruins.

The great danger to the religious circus is from the keepers themselvs, who, although they are trained to the business and taught due reverence for its colossal Jumbo, yet will, in spite of the frantic appeals of old ring-masters and clowns, keep raising up the blanket which covers it and exposing the hideous sores and ulcers which are fast eating away its very existence. Says the Independent "Any system of criticism, be it high or low, that attempts to accommodate itself in whole or in part to the demands of any form of Infidelity (or reason) will undermine the foundation of its own faith." We would suggest that it might be well to issue an order to these employees forbidding them to raise or allow others to raise Jumbo's blanket, on the same principle that a saw-mill exhibits the familiar sign, "Don't monkey with the buzz saw when in motion."

The Christian at Work, under the caption of an article called "The Tree Tested by its Fruits," intimates that all efforts at reform from Positivists and Freethinkers hav come to naught, and thus expresses it:

Now what hav the Positivists done since the death of Comte? They hav indeed carried on the work of speculativ philosophy, but to what good purpose? Meanwhile asylums and hospitals hav been going up, and now all England is ringing with a plan for alleviating misery and wretchedness, and all this the work of Christian men.

Seeing that misery and wretchedness is the logical output of Christianity, that it is born, reared, and nurtured into colossal proportions under the "beneficence of Christian civilization," we see no good reason why Christians should not take care of the victims of their iniquity. The Freethinkers and Positivists by reason of the wide prevalence of ignorant superstition through which the masses are taught that it is a certain God's will that they should be poor and miserable while others should be rich and happy, find their way blocked by bigotry, intolerance, and an animal fear which the church has implanted in its deluded followers. Will the Christian at Work tell us whence comes this misery and wretchedness of which it speaks? Not from generous Nature, which the church blasphemes by handing it over to an infernal God; not from the deliberate choice of the victims themselvs; whence comes it then? It comes from the impish environment of the masses produced by the selfishness which is the natural corollary of supernatural religion. Eliminate that curse, make the land free, and you can close up your "hospitals" and "homes" and "asylums," and mankind can at last come into possession of its natural heritage—the earth.

The Christian Intelligencer tells us how very good bibliolators are in these words:

Those who accept the Bible with simple (oh, how simple!) unquestioning faith, count the words as coming from God, with no regard for higher criticism nor any other criticism, become saintly, are divinely sustained in trials, endure hardness cheerfully; these hav more holiness, godliness, spirituality, than those who do not accept the scriptures with like faith.

Hear us, ye factory hands who toil from sunrise until sunset; hear us, ye miners who risk your lives that ye may not starve; hear us, ye railroad men; hear us, all ye toilers of the earth, who barely liv upon the wages ye receive, do ye not know that if you will endure hardness cheerfully you only hav to become a bibliolator, swallow the Bible at one gulp, and you shall be fed and clothed and housed spiritually. It is true you may faint with hunger, that you may be evicted from your home and left to freeze and starve to death on the highway with your helpless family dying about you—in fact, you may all finally die from this treatment, but do not blame the boss or the superintendent because they gather around their cosy fireplace for evening prayer; remember you are a bibliolator and it is God's will that you should suffer. Smile and die happy, my dear brother, bless God with your latest breath, and pray for the boss and superintendent. They need it badly.

The Christian Inquirer says in regard to the whereabouts of Elijah's body:

There is a point beyond which a zeal for knowledge is simply impertinence. Seeking to know what had become of Elijah the sons of the prophet were rebuked after their unsuccessful search.

This was rather hard on the sons. Of course they were curious to know what had become of the old man. Suppose we should, in this day, regard such seeking of knowledge as an impertinence? What would become of our detectiv bureau? Shal we prohibit wives and sons from seeking husbands and fathers? It is true they may not light out in a chariot of fire, but the Montreal special has borne away to Canadian shores many a Christian ornament to society, some of whom hav never been heard from, as was the case with Elijah. But then no one ever rebuked the sons for hunting for them or the wives for finding out whether they went off with another woman or not. I presume most of Elijah's relativs are dead and it will be of no use for me to express a suspicion which has lurked in my mind for years, and that is that it might be possible that there was an understanding between Elijah and his son Elisha, and that instead of going up in a chariot of fire he made of his son an immortal liar, and sneaked off with a young woman of Gilgal. This may not be historically correct, but it will hold its own with the rest of the story.

The Christian Union reviews the utterances of other religious journals in criticising Dr. Briggs's position, and expresses surprise "that hyper-orthodoxy and Infidelity should endeavor to forbid the banns which unite reason and scripture." It is a surprise to me to hear that there ever was any unity between reason and scripture, or any idea of their being joined in wedlock. Dr. Abbott says "which unite Reason and Scripture," conveying the idea that they are already married. We are inclined to believe that Dr. Abbott is mistaken, and that at the worst they hav only been flirting. That the two opposit extremists should forbid the banns is an evidence that at least for once they hav agreed upon a very proper thing to do. They are totally unfitted for each other, and their ancestors hav waged perpetual war against one another for centuries past, and it is impossible for them to be even on friendly terms, and the professor or doctor who tries the role of match-maker for this incongruous couple will find himself in the position of the man who tried to make peace between a fighting Irishman and his wife—they both turned upon him and beat him unmercifully.

Dr. Abbott says the scripture everywhere appeals to reason, but he fails to say just where we can find this appeal, and we cannot see how the nature of religion assists in the development of perfect manhood. Perfect manhood should include in its constituents a broad, noble, unselfish love for our race, so full of such a love as to protect the race from injustice and legalized wrong. Will Dr. Abbott show a few specimens of such a perfect manhood which Christianity has produced? Cannot Dr. Abbott see the reasonableness of setting things right in this world which we know are wrong, before we speculate upon our prospects in another world of which we know absolutely nothing? Subordinating the affairs of this life to the hopes for another, is insulting to the beneficence of nature of which we are the ungrateful recipients.

The absurdity of Dr. Abbott's remark "that it would be just as rational to declare that one abnegates his reason in accepting Legendre's Geometry as to declare that he abnegates it in accepting the Bible," is but another proof of the power of superstition over minds otherwise logical. It is pitiable.

The Christian Advocate, alluding to a letter sent to the Tribune anent the late Atheist, Charles Bradlaugh, gives a remark which the writer of the letter claims to hav made to Bradlaugh, and which (says the Advocate) can be applied to every Atheist or Infidel in the world. This is the remark said to hav been made by Mr. Steinitz to Mr. Bradlaugh:

You cannot solve the great mystery of life and of time and of space. If you wish to dissuade people from believing in Confucius, Moses, Christ, and Mohammed, you certainly cannot expect them to believe in Bradlaugh.

Aside from the manifest unfairness of repeating a remark made to a person who is now dead and also not giving his reply thereto, waiting as it were until his lips are forever closed and then launching it forth, a one-sided affair for the benefit of the church, aside from this there is absolutely nothing in it that any Infidel could not answer, nay, would rather seek to hav such a question propounded that in its reply he might forever silence the propagation of the false notion that Atheists or Infidels are seeking for a personal following, such as Moses, Christ, or other prophets gathered about them.

The Freethinker, Atheist, Infidel, or whatever name he may be called by, advises his friends to follow no man, priest, God, or devil; to believe nothing that is not consistent with his reason. He does not bait his hook to catch silly fish who bite only to be eaten, as the church does. He does not seek converts to any affirmativ views of his own. He pleads with man to use his own reasoning power to free himself from error and superstition, and the one single person he tells his friend to believe in is himself.

Followers of anybody or anything enslave themselvs and become voluntary prisoners. They debase themselvs by becoming mere copyists of a man perhaps inferior on the whole to themselvs.

This has been the deadly foe to progress and reform, and we would ask Mr. Steinitz to tax his memory a little further and giv Mr. Bradlaugh's answer to his wonderful question. He has done remarkably well with his query; perhaps he can do as well with the answer.

The Examiner, that rigid Baptist sheet, actually devotes a column to "Ouida" and her assault on Christianity published in the North American Review, and is "at a loss to discover the grounds on which the editor of so generally respectable a periodical should hav chosen as the assailant of Christianity the curious and rather disreputable person who under the name of 'Ouida' has for many years infested current literature." After thoroughly posting Ouida" up for her cordial hatred of "our countrywomen," by relating an alleged interview between one of our countrywomen and the "infester of current literature," the Examiner deals more with the character of the assailant than the matter assailed, a refuge that lawyers often take in a poor case—attack the character of the opposing principal.

The interview or "call" on Ouida is thus given: "An American woman risked a call upon her in Florence and was greeted with the remark, 'I don't care to receive Americans, they are so ignorant and underbred.'" To which, says the Examiner, our countrywoman with becoming spirit replied, "I suppose you think so because they read so many of your nasty books." If the books are "nasty," we do not see that "our countrywoman" helped her case or gave more evidence of the lady than did Ouida in her very rude greeting. The arraignment of Christianity which Ouida makes offers nothing new in the way of piercing the vulnerable armor of the church, and it is mentioned not so much for its own inherent appositness as to note the fact that the subject is becoming so interesting and popular as a theme for essays and debates that Ouida, a sensational novelist, writes on it for a periodical like the North American Review and that the editor of the Examiner reviews her article and writes her name and does not report the smell of brimstone in the air while doing it. Surely we are progressing.

The Torch of Reason vs. The Pansy.

The desirability, if not necessity, of an appropriate emblem for all classes of Freethinkers, Liberals, and Secularists must be conceded; in fact, a popular demand for such a badge must be supplied. What shall it be? A design symbolical of the glorious work and principles we are contending for, at once suitable, self-explanatory, beautiful, attractiv, novel, and original; or something commonplace, inappropriate, without sense or meaning, and moreover the public property of every man, woman, and child, a common article of adornment found upon every five-cent counter, in every millinery and jewelry establishment, a flower which already is worn by thousands who would indignantly scorn any connections with the Liberal or Secular propaganda, and which represents religious thought even more than progressiv thought?

Some ten years ago the late Miss Churchill placed upon the market a small, modest emblem representing U. M. L. (for Universal Mental Liberty), and a globe, symbolical of Universal Mental Liberty over the world. It had a moderate sale, and the writer occasionally received orders for the same. Being desirous of improving the rather humble design, I conferred with Miss Churchill concerning her price for a half interest in the same, including privilege to remodel it. From a letter, now before me, I quote her startling answer: "Providing your improvement on my design is pleasing to me, and providing a joint patent can be obtained, I make you the following offer: That you and I take out a joint patent in the United States, you to furnish the means to do so, and for the sum of $14,000 (!!!), $2,000 down and good security for the balance at five per cent interest, the $12,000 to be paid in $1,500 payments every six months, I will assign to you my part of the patent for the United States.—Lucy Churchill." This letter, which can be seen by anyone calling at my store, and its exorbitant proposition, induced me to originate and patent an entirely different design, and one which quickly superseded Miss Churchill's, as by far the more beautiful and appropriate emblem of the two. I not having the time or the needed capital to properly "push" the badge, it has not had as large a sale as it otherwise would hav had, yet thousands of them, of both sizes, are worn by many of the best men and women in the United States. I hav voluntary testimonials from almost every prominent Liberal in the United States, a few of which I will here append.

From Miss Ida Craddock, written a few days before the last congress, and in response to a diamond badge sent her conditionally that she would wear it, which, of course, implied that she indorsed it as the most suitable emblem for Liberals:

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 7, 1890.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of 2d inst. at hand, inclosing $10 for the American Secular Union, for which we thank you heartily. The Freethought badge-pin also arrived safely, and I need hardly say how delighted I am with it. I deeply appreciate this token of your esteem and shall be only too pleased to wear it, especially at our coming congress. The design is beautiful, appropriate, effectiv, and the more one looks at it, the more it grows upon one. One thing which especially pleases me in it is the arch of blue sky around Freethought, which suggests the freedom which Liberals, and only Liberals, possess of reaching upward and outward for new truths, through all infinity of space and time. But the whole design is eminently suitable for what it is intended to symbolize, and again I thank you for this gift. Yours very truly, IDA C. CRADDOCK.

PORTLAND, OREGON.

Your beautiful badge-pin received. To say that it is beautiful is simply to repeat what everyone says who looks at it. To say that the design covers the whole field of our work is to say what all must recognize at a glance.

MATTIE P. KREKEL.

FREEMONT, WASH.

In my perambulations I find every intelligent worker in the ranks of Infidelity desirous to possess and proud to wear the beautiful and appropriate emblem your genius has designed. It enables genuin Liberals to show their colors. All who love the cause of Universal Mental Liberty, all who desire the flag of liberty to wave above the cross of cruelty, all who devote time and means to keep aflame the torch of reason that it may illumin the darkness of superstition, are proud to wear the badge-pin, the emblem that so fully expresses their sentiments. The pansy represents nothing or anything; all characters, no characters; priest, parson, or school-girl can wear it; it is suitable to all who hav no convictions, aims, or purpose, or wish to disguise or conceal their true intent.

Only honest, outspoken men and women will bear the burning torch of reason and openly declare themselvs in favor of "Free Thought," the enemies of superstition.

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.

In view of these facts, what are we to think of the duplicity of our secretary, who, ten or fourteen days after writing the above letter, upon her own responsibility champions the adoption of a pansy; and now again, without consulting the great body of Liberals who sustain her in office, upon so important a question appeals to the "patriotism of every Freethinker," in an expensiv pamphlet paid from funds in our treasury, to adopt the pansy "as a silent, unobtrusiv testimony of his principles," etc.? Being pecuniarily interested, I reluctantly write this article, at the risk of my motivs being misconstrued, but I will add that when my design is improved upon or a more appropriate emblem suggested by Miss Craddock or anyone else I will cheerfully withdraw mine and use my utmost influence to induce all to wear the best badge. But until then I protest against the arbitrary usurpation of a single individual to attempt to crowd upon a vast army of intellectual men and women an emblem without sense, without meaning, and which no doubt in France or other countries will soon be superseded by the sun of science and torch of reason. Let every Liberal vote or speak his mind upon this important question.

Respectfully submitted, OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Washington Secular Union.

The annual convention of the Washington Secular Union was held at G. A. R. Hall, Seattle, on Sunday, Feb. 22, 1891. Despite bad weather, counter attractions, and other disadvantages, there was a good attendance and very earnest interest.

The delegates and members assembled realized it was not a mere hurrah gathering, but a business meeting for the purpose of conferring together and deciding on the best course to adopt to carry out the aims and objects of the organization. The morning and afternoon sessions were devoted to this purpose, and with excellent results.

The report of the secretary, reciting what had been accomplished during the year, the first of the organization, and making suggestions connected therewith, awoke much enthusiasm.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY.

To the Officers and Members of the Washington Secular Union in Convention Assembled:

Ladies and Gentlemen: The work of your secretary I hav found to be onerous, demanding zeal, persistence, and untiring industry. The first important matter demanding action was in regard to

PAID CHAPLAINS IN THE LEGISLATURE.

Your secretary wrote a number of letters of remonstrance to members of the house and senate.

The following letter to Hon. A. H. Eddy, from Snohomish, is a sample:

OFFICE OF WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION, SEATTLE,
Feb. 3, 1890.

HON. A. H. EDDY, My Dear Sir: The Liberals of our state hav just completed practical organization. Our object is to secure Secularization of our government—to keep church and state forever separate and our flag above the cross.

While it may not be advisable to publicly express our appreciation of your efforts to enforce compliance with the constitution, and put an end to paid chaplains in the houses of legislation and exemption of church property from taxation, we desire to assure you of our earnest support and sympathy in your efforts in that direction, and that you may depend on the Liberals' grateful remembrance of your services in behalf of equal rights to all.

If you can suggest any service or action on our part that will be helpful in preventing payment of chaplains and to abolish the office, please drop me a line, and you can rely on your suggestions meeting prompt and energetic action.

Your friend and coworker for reason, right, and truth,
C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. W. S. U.

Success crowned our first endeavor. And it is a strange fact that since the legislature cut off the salary of the chaplains prayers hav been like angels' visits, few and far between. It is perhaps wicked to think that prayers come and go at the beck and call of the "almighty—dollar." It may be more charitable to believe that the ministers ceased praying at the capital because of the lack of appreciable effect on the members.

OATHS AND AFFIRMATIONS.

The constitution especially guarantees, Art. i, Sec. 5.:

"The mode of administering an oath or affirmation shall be such as may be most consistent with and binding upon the conscience of the person to whom such oath or affirmation may be administered."

Sec. 2. "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual."

Yet in several courts of law witnesses were required to take oath or make affirmation with raised hand. Your secretary promptly called the attention of the judiciary to the constitutional bill of rights, and wrote articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and Ironclad Age. "Know your rights and dare maintain them." The right is now conceded in all courts of the state, that no person in the state of Washington can legally be required to take any form of oath or any special form of affirmation other than such as shall be most consistent and binding upon their conscience.

No person when making an affirmation need to raise their hand, bow their knee, sit, stand, or assume any particular position other than such as best suits their own pleasure and convenience.

NO QUESTIONS AS TO RELIGIOUS BELIEF.

No judge, no lawyer, juror, nor any other person has any right, in any court of justice in this state, to question a witness or juror in regard to his or her opinion, belief, or disbelief on matters of religion.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

In this connection your secretary desires to express admiration and gratitude to that noble Liberal, our lamented treasurer, the late Geo. M. Boman. He was ever ready to giv advice, to make sacrifices, and do hard, efficient work to advance the cause of mental liberty, and secure entire and complete divorce of church and state. He very greatly helped to make my position as secretary endurable, ever inspiring to renewed hope, courage, and endeavor. Realizing the need of prompt action to defeat the subtle schemes of the combined church organizations, and that delays are dangerous, he anticipated some of the work of the Union. He commissioned Watson Heston to design a cartoon to show most forcibly the injustice of exempting church property from taxation, and under the title of "Taxed and Untaxed" most ably did Heston fill the order. At Mr. Boman's request, I wrote the leaflet, "Words of Wisdom," and mailed three thousand copies of the cartoon and leaflet to Liberals throughout the state, with requests that they would induce friends to sign and forward the accompanying letter, with cartoon and leaflet, to their members of the legislature, Mr. Boman paying the entire cost.

I would respectfully call the attention of the convention to the fact that the only real advantage of petitions is that seeking signatures calls attention to, and arouses interest in, the question at issue. Signatures are easily obtained, but hav little or no weight with legislators. But if personal letters are sent by voters to the members of the house and senate, urging certain action, every such letter tells, because each letter is positiv evidence of a voter's real interest and desires, and no politician can afford to ignore the personal desires of a large and wide-awake number of his constituents.

Every member of both houses of the legislature was deluged with letters inclosing the cartoon and leaflet, signed by voters of their respectiv precincts—a gentle hint that if they fail to work and vote for right and justice, those voters will fail to work and vote for them next election.

We need to use the same tactics in repeal of all Sunday laws.

Thanks to the indomitable energy of our treasurer, Geo. M. Boman, and the efforts of the Washington Secular Union, the revenue bill passed by the last legislature decrees that all church property, private school, and hospital property shall be taxed at full valuation; and this is in strict accord with the constitution, and every principle of right and justice.

Your secretary wrote an open letter to Governor Ferry, which was published in Seattle and Tacoma papers of June 27th and 29th, calling his attention to the law, and urging him to use his rightful authority in compelling assessors to comply with that law. Some fifty copies of the Tacoma Globe containing the letter to Governor Ferry were sent to assessors of the different counties.

On July 11th I published a letter to Attorney-general Jones, in answer to his of July 6th, in regard to taxation of church property, and over one hundred copies were distributed by mail.

I received a letter from a member of the house committee on the revenue bill, himself an earnest Liberal, informing me that the emergency clause was not attached to the bill because it was understood the churches should hav one year of grace to pay their taxes, so they could not complain that it was a burden suddenly sprung upon them; that if a case was now made in the courts, the churches would concentrate efforts to effect repeal of the law at the next session of the legislature, but if the matter rested till next assessment, the law would be surely enforced, and its repeal be almost impossible.

We need to heed the admonition of Washington, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." There is need of every Liberal in the state joining our organization, and of the election in each precinct of an executiv officer as vice-president of the state society, so they can in their official capacity, as the representativs of Liberals of their respectiv precincts, demand compliance with the law, knowing they are backed in their just demands by all the genuin Liberals of the state.

SUNDAY LAWS.

Any law enforcing Sunday observance, or the religious observance of any feast, fast, or holy day, is a violation of our constitution, which declares: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual." "No one shall be disturbed in person or property on account of religion."

Hence no person pursuing any legitimate occupation, or lawful pleasure or pastime, on Sunday, any more than on any other day of the week, can be disturbed because of any one else's religious sentiments. What is lawful on any one day in the week is equally lawful on every other day of the week.

Early in October, under the scheming of Rev. Wilbur Crafts, who made his headquarters at Tacoma, from whence he issued instructions to his dupes and unprincipled emissaries, the fanatics of Seattle endeavored to enforce the territorial Sunday law, and arrested the proprietors of three barber-shops for keeping open shop and working on Sunday. Two, not members of our Union, were scared into paying $25 fine, and promising to close their shops on Sunday thenceforth. Mr. Christopher belongs to the Washington Secular Union. He retained counsel before he was aware that the society would defend him. His counsel was assisted by our president, R. Winsor. Judge Rivers decided that the word "trade" in the statute does not apply to handicraft or mechanical labor, or ordinary work or occupation, but to sale or barter of goods or merchandise. The prisoner was discharged. Two weeks later Mr. Christopher was again arrested, and this time taken before the superior court. The Sunday fanatics retained able counsel to assist the prosecuting attorney. Every possible effort was made to secure a conviction. We entered a demurrer that the court had no original jurisdiction in any such cases according to the statute. The court sustained the demurrer. The prisoner was discharged.

Exasperated by repeated failure, the fanatics swore out warrants and had the principal clothing merchants arrested for violation of the Sunday law. After many delays, the case of Mr. Hershbergh, a member of the Union, was made a test case. Col. James H. Lewis and General Metcalf appeared for the defense. The jury promptly rendered a verdict of acquital. All the prisoners were discharged.

In the case at Spokane Falls the jury promptly acquitted.

In the last case at Tacoma, that of a barber, not a member of the Washington Secular Union, his counsel applied for and we furnished him with brief, made up from the Seattle cases. The jury promptly acquitted, and the court very wisely decreed that the fanatics who instituted the persecution should pay all the costs—since which they hav remained quite passiv.

Thus our victory is complete and the fanatics are utterly routed. We should hav preferred that a case should be carried to the supreme court and decided. Fanatics still hav power to annoy by procuring arrests.

There is great interest in this subject, and now would be just the right time to issue a leaflet or small pamphlet giving in concise form the biblical, historical, and legal facts in regard to Sunday laws and Sunday observance. Such a pamphlet would at this time be eagerly read by all classes.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The law requires appeals to be made to the local school board. Not till relief or justice has been refused by the board, can an appeal be made to the superior court for a mandamus.

Your secretary has done an immense amount of writing to various school boards, and in several cases succeeded in obtaining orders to teachers to comply with the constitution and cease all religious exercises in connection with school work.

Once we can obtain a decision of the supreme court, all religious exercises and instruction in any public school of Washington will end forever.

The most devout Christians are really as much interested as Liberals in the enforcement of the wise provisions of the constitution prohibiting religious exercise or instruction in our public schools; for if, just now while Protestants are in a majority it is right to read the Protestant Bible, repeat the Lord's Prayer, and sing gospel hymns, soon Catholics may be in the majority and insist on reading the Catholic Bible, repeating prayers to the Virgin Mary, and performing high mass.

Why has not the one as much right in our public schools as the other?

The law, our constitution, is all on our side of right, but the arrogant assumptions, the law-breaking proclivities, of priests and parsons render an appeal to the courts to enforce their obedience to its just requirements an absolute necessity. No other remedy will avail.

THE STATE UNIVERSITY.

Modifications, considerable concessions, hav been made in regard to old style chapel services, but religious exercises are persisted in, contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitution and the law. Your secretary has been compelled to let the matter go by default, the president in his legal capacity refusing to take action till ample funds are in the treasury to meet his retaining fees and all legal expenses.

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION.

Crowded with other duties, I failed to mail a letter of remonstrance to Governor Ferry against making proclamation of Thanksgiving as a religious holiday. While we concede the right of appointing legal holidays, in which no person could be compelled to transact business, yet, my letter said, the servants of the people hav no right to settle the vexed question of which God is to be worshiped, nor appoint any set time, or recommend the observance of any set time, for such worship. My letter continued, that "Force and Energy" are regarded by the most intelligent citizens of Washington as "the supreme ruler of the Universe," and that the citizens of Washington, when they had cause of gratitude to any God, or man, were fully competent to select time and mode of returning thanks without any instructions from their servants or politicians. Governor Ferry kindly inclosed me a copy of his proclamation, informing me that it had been prepared before he received my letter.

I would respectfully urge that every Liberal in Washington write a letter to the governor upon this subject not later than September of next year.

TO WIN WOMEN'S HELP.

One of our greatest needs is to win the hearty coöperation of good women. Success depends on our doing so. But they are attached to their churches, and many noble, conscientious women will not read a Liberal or scientific book, pamphlet, or paper; will not attend a Liberal lecture, nor listen to any facts or arguments on the subject. They, as well as many well-intentioned men, hav been educated to believe that to do so is to step upon the devil's ground. How can we reach them? They will all read their local newspaper.

Your secretary has received very encouraging letters from those places where by the influence of the executiv officer of our society items and articles tending to awake to thought and investigation, without arousing prejudice, hav been sent by your secretary and published in local papers. Believing this work most important, practical, and likely to add to our number, I call attention to the need of electing vice-presidents in every town, and the weekly or semi-weekly furnishing of items or articles for local papers to the vice-presidents throughout the state. To render this work possible and to facilitate the great labor devolved on your secretary, he should be furnished with a type-writer—the best attainable and most efficient manifolder.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Secretary.

At the afternoon session election of officers for the ensuing year was held. In accordance with our constitution no nominations were allowed. Each delegate wrote on the ballot the name of the person he desired to fill the office. Each officer was balloted for separately. Every officer was elected on the first ballot. No better evidence could be afforded of the harmony of the convention, no more gratifying assurance to the persons elected that they were the first and unanimous choice of the society.

The following officers were elected: President, Robert J. Wilson, of Seattle; secretary, C. B. Reynolds, of Freemont; treasurer, Mary E. Boman, of Freemont; directors at large, Albert Rosenow, of Walla Walla; P. B. Morton, of Seattle. These officers comprise the board of directors and executiv committee.

WHO AND WHAT THEY ARE.

The president, R. J. Wilson, is to-day the leading Liberal of Seattle; a young man, but a deep thinker and a shrewd observer, possessing excellent judgment. He is a genuin hustler, a true Liberal in the best and fullest sense of the term—an Infidel devoted heart, brain, and pocket-book to the cause of mental liberty and human progress. He is making a success of life, and is regarded by the business men of Seattle as a most reliable, energetic, rising man. He came to this city a stranger, without friends or funds, depending solely on his ability, integrity, and energy. He has deserved the good success that has rewarded him.

The Washington Secular Union can rely on his judgment, zeal, and devotion to the aims and objects of the organization.

The secretary, C. B. Reynolds, during the past year did the very best he could, and, with the increased facilities, accepts the burden for another year.

Of the treasurer, Mary E. Boman, I will say: The action of the board of directors in electing Mrs. M. E. Boman as treasurer and member of the board, to fill the place of her deceased husband, was heartily indorsed by the convention by her unanimous election as treasurer for the ensuing year. Mrs. Boman is a lady of sound practical common sense and more than average business ability. The loved and honored helpmate of George M. Boman, she is thoroughly imbued with his spirit of love of liberty and devotion to the aims and objects of our organization. The society has not alone secured an efficient treasurer, but proved true to its principles and elected a clear-headed, energetic, public-spirited woman of means and influence as one of the board of directors.

Director at large for east of the Cascades is A. Rosenow, the prince of Walla Walla, not prince because of haughty mien or lordly airs, but because an aristocrat of the Courtlandt Palmer style—a prince in the nobility of his nature, his broad views, his generosity, his lofty aims, his good, pure, useful life, and noble efforts to promote the greatest good to the greatest number.

The director at large for west of the Cascades is P. B. Morton, of Seattle. He brings to the office of director the experience gained by dealing with all sorts of persons, as the successful agent of one of the largest business enterprises of the United States. He is an out and out Infidel, pure and undefiled; kind, modest, gentle, yet fearless, energetic, and persistent in defense of right, uncompromising in opposition to wrong or injustice. He livs for the good he can do, ever seeking his own happiness by promoting the happiness and welfare of others.

If unbounded success does not crown the efforts of the Washington Secular Union during the ensuing year, it will not be for lack of ability, zeal, or fidelity on the part of the board of directors.

SUNDAY LAWS.

Moved and seconded, unanimously carried: That the secretary be and is hereby instructed and authorized to write, compile, and hav printed five thousand leaflets or pamphlets, giving as concisely as possible the facts, biblical, historical, and legal, in regard to Sunday laws and Sabbath observance. Said leaflets or pamphlets to be for gratuitous distribution throughout the state.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

On motion, carried unanimously: That the board of directors be, and are hereby, authorized and instructed to, at the earliest possible opportunity, make a test case in regard to religious exercises in our public schools, and to carry such case to the supreme court for decision.

On motion, carried unanimously: That the secretary be instructed to make written appeals to the Liberals of the state for contributions to the defense fund, to meet the necessary expense of such an appeal to the supreme court.

TYPE-WRITER FOR THE SECRETARY.

Motion made, seconded, and carried unanimously: That the Union provide a type-writer for the use of the secretary, and that a collection be taken forthwith to raise funds to pay for the same.

A collection was taken amounting to $53.90; it was ascertained that the price of a first-class type-writer would not be less than $100.

On motion, carried unanimously: That the secretary be, and is hereby, empowered to use funds of the Union sufficient to make up the cost of a suitable type-writer, purchase the instrument at once, and solicit contributions from Liberals (who did not attend the convention and so saved expense) to repay said balance of cost of type-writer, and as contributions are received by the secretary he shall pay the same over to the general fund of the organization.

FIELD SECRETARY.

Motion made, seconded, and carried unanimously: that Mrs. F. C. Reynolds be, and is hereby, appointed field secretary of the Washington Secular Union.

Motion made, seconded, and carried unanimously: That a special fund be raised for the express purpose of defraying the expenses of the field secretary when laboring in places where the resident Liberals are not able to pay the full amount of cost incurred.

Mrs. Mary E. Boman pledged $50; Jacob Drissler, of Willapa, pledged $50; H. A. Towner, of Willapa, pledged $50; J. F. Miller, of Lynden, pledged $10 each year, to said fund.

On motion, it was ordered that the secretary make written appeals to the Liberals throughout the state for contributions to the field secretary fund.

Motion made, seconded, and carried unanimously: That Liberals in any part of the state desiring the services of the field secretary to lecture, or aid in forming local auxiliary Unions, may make application to the secretary, stating full particulars of their needs, and just what the Liberals of the place are willing to do toward defraying the expenses. All such applications shall be promptly laid before the board of directors, and when they are approved by them the field secretary shall be engaged to perform such needed services, and shall be paid from the field secretary fund such amount as the board of directors shall deem just and equitable.

VICTORIA, B. C., SECULAR UNION.

Motion made, seconded, and unanimously carried: That the Washington Secular Union in convention assembled send fraternal greeting to the officers and members of the Victoria, B. C., Secular Union, and pledge them our sympathy and our hearty coöperation in the grand and noble work in which they are engaged.

On motion adjourned. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec.
R. J. WILSON, Pres.

On Sunday afternoon a stirring address on the injustice of Sunday laws was delivered by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds.

On Sunday evening there were recitations by the great, original Devere, and the talented fairy child of genius, Little Stella Langdon; and a lecture by Rev. H. Hangurud, subject, "The Chained Bear, or the Lives of Great Thinkers and the Treatment They Received at the Hands of the Church."

The recitations were rapturously encored. The lecture was intensely interesting, and the speaker was heartily applauded. The attendance was large. The convention was a decided success.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Are Our Clergy Wise Men?

No one can say so! As individuals they do not compare favorably with good, practical smart fellows out of the church. In San Francisco we hav 10,000 men who are away up above our clergy in all that makes a gentleman and a model man. In council they fall away behind an ordinary meeting of gentlemen in conduct, manners, appropriate and logical speech, and practical common sense. No conference of the preachers of this city meets that does not display the most lamentable ignorance on very important topics on which society outside has already passed judgment. Their discussion of the wickedness of our city, the Sunday question, the way to catch our young men, and their patronage of such as Moody, the boy preacher, and others, betray a most lamentable weakness of understanding.

On the laws of their country, the ordinary political stump-speaker is infinitly beyond them, even on such matters as pertain to religion. He knows, and they do not, it would seem, that as a nation we care for no one religion more than another. This is not by any law a Christian country. They are not recognized by our people or our law as anointed or appointed, or in any sense the agents of God, more than others. All men are equal before the law. There is neither pastor nor master, bishop, archbishop, or cardinal in this land. It is all bosh. The assumption of a title, as bishop of California, or San Francisco, is all idle nonsense. It is simply bishop in the Catholic or Methodist church, no more.

So when they speak of the wickedness of our city, and our young men who never go to church, their proposed remedies are mere midsummer madness. Moody and Sankey and the Salvation Army are of no use. Our young men graduates of the common school are away up above that sphere. What they need is a school of preachers who can say to them: "Our religion is true, and we can prove it. Come on with your Ingersolls, or any other men. Let them make their objections and their criticisms! We will meet them in public assembly and confute them all." And they dare not do it. They hav not a man in all their ranks who can giv a sound reason for the faith that is in him.

Then they deplore the fact, continually, that our smart men neglect the church. Out of 55,000 voters less than 2,000 attend their preachings on Sunday. Now, if we admit that 10,000 of these are away below them in morals and manners, are sometimes drunken, and occasionally fall into the hands of the police, yet the account stands thus:

Without the church	43,000
Attending church	2,000
Down below church	10,000
Total	55,000

Those out of the church are away above the church. They need neither preacher nor police. They hav the schools, the newspapers, the law, and the scientists for guides. And the church can never reach them, save by a demonstration of the faith.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG left New York at midnight, Tuesday, March 10th, for his Southern campaign. He spoke in Richmond Wednesday night, to a fair-sized audience, many of whom seemed to be in hearty sympathy with the speaker. The leading dailies all gave full reports of the lecture, and thousands who did not attend had the benefit of it. The Times and Dispatch, while indulging in a few sarcastic thrusts at Freethought, were diffuse in their praise of the address, characterizing the speaker's language as "vivid," "eloquent," and "beautiful." The Dispatch man was evidently expecting to see the traditional hoof and horns, and was probably disappointed because he did not. He says: "Mr. Remsburg, whatever his religious, or more properly irreligious doctrins are, is quite a handsome man. He has an exceedingly gentle look, while there is nothing violent or bloodthirsty in his manner of address." On Thursday night Mr. Remsburg spoke in the Metropolitan Opera House at North Carolina's capital, Raleigh.

In Search of a Spirit.

One reason why I admire your paper is, that its title, which covers a vast field, implies that those in search of truth are not limited or confined to any rules or forms, so when this paper givs any rules or forms by which it should be governed in its search for truth, and says we should not go beyond this, then it will be time for all who are honest searchers after the realities of our existence and future destiny to depart and leave it to its fate. It is my desire that all who read it are true to its title, and let this be their motto:

Let truth be treasured up wherever found,
Let it be on Christian or on heathen ground.

I am not a confirmed Spiritualist, but I say, if there is any future for us beyond the so called death, I would be glad to know it.

There are many of your readers who do not follow the motto of the paper they read. Some go so far as to say that all who are Spiritualists are insane, or they hav lost their reason, or they are mesmerized or put into some kind of a supernatural condition of mind in order to see the things that they claim to hav seen.

Now, I am just reasonable enough to say that all this is nonsense. Any man who sets his judgment against many others who hav an equal chance of seeing and hearing with him, and yet will say they were mistaken, their eyes deceived them, and their ears lied to them, that they were in a delusion or a dreaming vision, that they were excited and their imagination deceived them—such a person, who is presumptuous enough to giv himself such superiority over his fellow-creatures, is an egotistical fool. Solomon has said, "He that is wise in his own conceit, there is more hope of a fool than of him." Such persons as these surely are wise in their own conceit.

After an examination of a few communications to THE TRUTH SEEKER on Spiritualism, I feel compelled to criticise, in justice to those who are honest investigators and are willing to reason. I am also prompted to say what I do by a request to join an association styled the Brotherhood of Moralists, which claims to be a Liberal society whose purpose and object is to search for truth; and yet their constitution contains an article which requires all its members to combat all theories and opinions or beliefs in the continued existence after the grave of this self-conscious, individual, intelligent principle we call life, as insane delusions. This I cannot do, because their creed is inconsistent with itself; it involves a plain contradiction. They hav defined their boundaries and built a wall around their creed out of which none can go who are honest searchers after truth, and yet they all claim to be truth seekers, for all read the paper bearing that name, yet their very profession of faith is a slander on and a forgery of that name. They say to all who join them: We are searching for the truths which are around us all along the journey of life, and we want to add these as fast as possible to our store of knowledge, but you cannot go outside of our inclosure to find them.

This is to shut the door of progress and close in a few who will say, "The present is good enough for me"—a few who hav expressed their opinion that what suits them should suit everybody else, and who hav taken an obligation to expose mediums. It is the same as saying: "I don't want to know any more; I will stop here and let progressiv humanity go on and leave me behind. I will become firmly fixed and planted. I will become petrified and fossilized. I will sink into the rust and oblivion of past ages. If there is a future of endless joy in store for me beyond the grave, I want to know nothing about it. I will be as intolerant as the Christians. I hav been persecuting in intolerance." Such as this is poor encouragement to the honest and earnest seeker after truth.

But it is a better satisfaction to know that we are not, neither do we intend to be, bound by their creed.

I hav just been reading in your paper a letter from W. W. Walker, of December 27th, in which he speaks of the Brotherhood of Moralists, and gives his objections, which are identically the same as mine. I hav seen the same manifestations that he speaks of, and many more, which convince me that there is an intelligent force that can answer questions to the satisfaction of the person who asks the question. I hav seen this done among a few assembled neighbors who knew nothing about tricks. Electricity and magnetism are forces, but these forces cannot be made to keep time to music, or answer questions, giving dates of entertainments and the number of years back to certain events. Many questions of this character I hav asked in circles for the express purpose of testing this invisible force, and all such questions were answered correctly. I know it could not hav been done by tricks when no person in the house knew the answer but me.

Now the field is open offering a splendid opportunity for some persons to immortalize themselvs by explaining or exposing, in such a way that we shall understand, how this is done. If this can be explained by any other philosophy than the Spiritual, the person who is fortunate enough to discover it will make enough to pay him well for his trouble.

Any society that claims to be Liberal and yet maintains a clause in its constitution which is a bar to progress, is inconsistent and unreasonable. None but those who are egotistical enough to think they hav solved the mysteries of the past, present, and future, and want everything to stop where they stop, will ever take such an obligation and try to be duplicates of Joshua—who commanded the sun and moon to stand still, but the sun and moon moved on, and so will all nature regardless of either Joshua or the Brotherhood of Moralists.

It does seem strange that Spiritualism has met so many enemies and survived all of them, and the more it is persecuted the more it seems to grow. Yet it may be that Spiritualism has been permitted to liv through these many years so that the crowning glory of its destruction may be given to the Brotherhood of Moralists.

"By their fruits ye shall know them;" so I prophesy the downfall of this association. Progress is the order of the age, and if we do not grow we must decay and our substance giv nourishment to something that will grow; such is the order of nature.

When I say I am in search of a spirit, I say it shall be my honest endeavor, first, to search into everything that offers any prospects of obtaining more light; and second, to protest against anything that resists instruction or reason on any subject. If we did not, it would be falling in with the church fanatics. If we advocate reform, it is not consistent with our principles to resist investigation.

We had a materializing medium here from San Francisco, who held séances in our town for two weeks. Many said she was a fraud, but during all that time none were able to detect or discover where the fraud was. While the best opportunity was offered for detection, yet after all this she may hav been a fraud.

It is not proper for the honest investigator to jump at conclusions prematurely. We should continue to search for the facts until we are well satisfied that we hav convicted a medium of fraud before we come to that conclusion, and if we convict one medium it does not imply that they are all frauds, for the very word fraud signifies a principle which the fraud pretends to represent. If there is no genuin, there is nothing to counterfeit and a fraud would be impossible. The word fraud originated where a true person was falsely represented. At this age there are many frauds who call themselvs Jesus Christ, which implies that a person once lived who was known by that name who said he would come again.

Frauds and counterfeits appearing everywhere are the things which should inspire the honest investigator to more diligent search, for among so much fraud there may be found some genuin and true mediums. So there is evidence and reason enough to convince any person who is blessed with good sense that this Spiritualistic theory is not all a vain delusion, as this Brotherhood would hav it.

North Yakima, Wash. JAMES BECK.

The Phenomena of Mediumship.

I consider an exposition of the true philosophy of the phenomena (?) of "clairvoyance," "clairaudience," "table-talking," "mediumship," "séances," and other kindred hallucinations to be an essential guide to the intellectual faculties in the pursuit of absolute truth.

In the edition of February 14th, W. L Willis descants on what he erroneously entitles the "facts" of a "new science." The aforesaid "facts" which he labors to divulge, subvert the ultimate principles which he intends they shall maintain, inasmuch as the operation of the occult forces which he so explicitly describes, reveals the true basis of the phenomena, which is distorted to his own conception by unmitigated prejudice or inordinate credulity.

The alternate collocation of the opposit sexes around the table and its insulation, the mental quiescence of the whole, are preëminently auspicious to the production of hypnotic catalepsy and transmission of the same; and the oppressiv darkness and utter silence facilitate the elaboration of the chimera and its contagion. An influence similar in character, though milder in effect, pervades the immediate precincts of the enthusiastic revivalist, irrespectiv of the nature of his adopted superstition.

If Mr. Willis will assume the labor of historical research, he will ascertain that the essence of his "new science" is familiar to a sect of Egyptian sorcerers which boasts an antiquity of forty centuries, the primitiv records of which are still extant, preserved by hieroglyphic inscriptions and symbolic representations; that the Arabic and Moorish magicians were conversant with the same methods of inducing and controling the magnetic sympathy which he now alleges to be a recent innovation; that Hippocrates himself utilized this potential property in assuaging pain; that Esculapius likewise exercised it as an anodyne, subdued hysteria, nostalgia, and hypochondriasis thereby, and in critical cases effected a magnetic equilibrium between himself and his patient, in order to diagnose latent symptoms otherwise palpable to the mind of the patient alone. Von Helmont, a Flemish philosopher who flourished A D. 1630, was an advocate and practitioner of the already ancient art, concerning the simplicity of which he states, "magnetism is activ everywhere; it is a paradox only to those who ridicule everything, and attribute to Satan what they themselvs are unable to explain."

The system of Mesmer was identical in principle and application with that now expounded by Mr. Willis. His clinic apartments were "dimly lighted, and hung with mirrors; bewildering strains of music often broke the profound stillness; . . . holding each other's hands, the patients sat in mute expectancy."

When thus the imagination is intoxicated, and unrestrained by the intellect, previously lulled into a narcotic stupor, the magnetic current, no longer under control, follows the line of least resistance, and the powers of communication are established by and under the complete direction of the person designated by Mr. Willis as the "medium," ie, he or she who best resists the soporific impulses, and whose self-engendered fantasies, either ocular, auricular, olfactory, gustatory, or mental, are simultaneously transmitted to all connected.

In the event of the presence of a neutral within the circle, the current is broken by his magnetic nonconduction, and the spell impotent.

I hav witnessed the consecutiv excitation of every separate mental faculty when the subject was under mesmeric subjugation. In this condition, if the operator excite the seventeenth phrenological faculty in his own brain, or concentrate the neurotic current of the subject to that organ by external manipulation of the corresponding portion of the cranium, visions of the weird, the unearthly, and the mysterious at once throng the exalted imagination of the subject; and if the operator actuate the motory subdivision of the language center in his own brain, that center being internally situated in the parietal lobe and hence unsusceptible in the subject to the influence of external contact on the head, as in the preceding instance, the subject unconsciously transcribes the words sympathetically yet silently dictated by the operator. Thus the magnetizer may produce an illusion of sound by exciting the auditory center, of vision by the optic center, of taste by the gustatory ganglion, etc.

Everyone instructed in the rudiments of acoustics knows that no sound can exist inaudible to all save a few, other conditions being equal; that atmospheric vibrations or undulations produce like oscillations of the tympanum of every ear at all times, its interior and exterior configurations being normal.

By hypnotic suppression of the sentiments incident to the organ of veneration and exacerbation of that of destructivness, profane thoughts and sacrilegious language are as effectually induced in a most devout ecclesiastic as expressions of piety can be superinduced by fomenting it to abnormal action even in an Atheist. Hence, religious or Atheistic, "spiritual" or secular sentiments, visions, and sounds depend solely upon the volition of the "medium," regardless of the auspices of any "spirits" whatsoever, either terrestrial, "celestial," or "infernal."

An invisible "spirit" can possess no brain, no nerves, no concomitant body, and therefore can neither think, impress, nor convey thought, ignoring the absurdity of visual manifestation.

To a single, unvarying question propounded by a second person acting under my instruction, at divers times during nine distinct "table-talking" "séances" in San Francisco, as many different and conflicting responses were rendered, six of which, or two-thirds of the whole, were diametrically contradictory. It thus appears that the "spirits" are as fallible and as ignorant as their inventors.

If, to cite Mr. Willis's rhapsody, "death takes no more effect on an individual than stepping from one room into another," the organic dissolution of the physical elements is a chemical delusion, and experience and knowledge are but the specters of a frightful dream.

When Mr. Willis demonstrates that thought can originate or be reproduced otherwise than through the instrumentality of a brain connected with an animate body, or evinces that mind can be elaborated or perpetuated by another species of motion than brain motion, he may then promulgate his fantastic hypothesis without fear of refutation. Otherwise, until the decay of reason and the obsolescence of logic, his efforts must be in vain and his scheme go by default.

Were it possible to perceive and remember antenatal existence, we might reason from analogy that memory might survive the decomposition of its essential factors; but until the sublime mechanism of the human mind be artificially created and artificially preserved, they rear castles in the ether and dream of shadows who hope for immortality.

If we can impel our understanding to believe the incredible, to renounce experience, to doubt science, and to abandon the material, and repose implicit confidence in the inaudible, the intangible, the inscrutable, the imperceptible, the eternally absent, and the unnatural, then only can we reject the jewels of knowledge and choose the gewgaws of a frenzied imagination.

I deem it logically more absurd to admit the existence of sensate, incorporeal beings within or without the domain of human cognizance or communication, than to concede the reality of the most inconsistent personage of oriental mythology.

The "spirits" and the "soul" alike are founded on the poet's dream and the fantasy of the alchemist In slumber they thrive, but in wakefulness they vanish like the vapors of the dawn.

Sincerely submitted, M. L. SALTER.

Hugh Owen Thomas.

There died in Liverpool on January 6th one of the greatest surgeons and most admirable of men that England has produced. Seldom hav so many tributes from churchmen been paid to an Infidel as the Liverpool clergy paid to Hugh Owen Thomas, with whom they often disputed, who always opposed their religion, who scattered heretical literature with a liberal hand, who sheltered Charles Bradlaugh when he was most unpopular and when to be that great man's friend was to be socially ostracised. One of Dr. Thomas's favorit means of controverting the church was to get Mr. Stocker, his newsman, to obtain a great number of TRUTH SEEKERS sell what he could, and then giv away the remainder at the expense of Dr. Thomas. Yet when death suddenly came to the Infidel the clergy could find no words too flattering to be said over his bier, and one of them compared him to Jesus Christ because on Sundays he treated as many of the poor of his city free of charge as came to his house. At his funeral over four hundred workingmen, representing more than a dozen societies, as well as representativs from medical institutions and colleges, were present.

The funeral, strange to say, was conducted by Nonconformist clergy, and this is what one of the speakers, more honest than some preachers, said of him:

The man whose mortal remains we are now about to consign to the earth was a remarkable person in many respects. He was a man of undoubted genius, and with this he combined deep earnestness of purpose, great power of will, an untiring industry, and great goodness of heart. These qualities, found so rarely in such happy combination, he devoted to a profession peculiarly adapted to giv fullest scope to their exercise and development. His genius enabled him to discover new ways and methods of treating many of the severe ills that human flesh is heir to. His indefatigable industry enabled him to giv a wide scope and permanent effect to these products of his genius His goodness of heart and kindly disposition won him the esteem and love and confidence of all with whom he came in contact, whether in his professional or private capacity. His humanitarian benevolence is witnessed to by the readiness with which he bestowed his professional skill upon the poorer part of the community, as is testified to by his Sunday labors on their behalf His comparativly early death will excite universal regret, and will be regarded as a severe loss not only to this large town of Liverpool, but to the country outside; to Wales, where his name was a household word; to Scotland and Ireland, whence scores sought the benefit of his great skill Whatever else our departed friend was, he was undoubtedly an honest and a good man. However some of us who had the honor and privilege of his friendship might regret that he did not see eye to eye with us in regard to the Christian creed, none of us ever for a moment could find fault with his Christian practice. Yea, if integrity in dealings, if purity of life, if benevolent labors be Christly qualities, our late friend was truly one of the most Christlike men I ever knew. I say this with the utmost confidence after twenty-eight years of the closest intimacy with him. During that long interval as a Christian minister it was my privilege to learn much from his practical Christianity. In his domestic relations, whether as husband or brother, or whatever other relationship he held, he was simply perfect—at least as perfect as it is possible for human being to be. And as a friend, there are those both within and outside the profession who can testify with great sincerity and gratitude how true, sympathetic, and helpful a friend he was. The great lesson of Dr Thomas's life is that the noblest life is the useful, and that the highest form of usefulness is that devoted to the service of suffering humanity; and in this field of human service Dr. Thomas has a noble record.

Another was honest enough to say this:

He was not a Christian—at least not in the conventional and theological sense. He never joined a visible church. But he has cast out many a devil in his time, and loosed many a poor victim from his infirmity. He did this, whatever you may call him. He did it, though he followed not us. In many things he strangely and strikingly resembled our Lord, the son of man, the good physician, the friend of publicans and sinners. He did not come to church. I wish he had, perhaps. And yet he was at church. He did not lounge or sleep his Sundays away. He ministered to his own poor and sick and suffering congregation. He healed on the Sabbath day, and showed the day was made for man and not man for the day.

A writer in the Liverpool Mercury tells briefly the story of his life:

For many years Dr Thomas has remained one of the most notable men in Liverpool. Here his figure was familiar to everyone, but he enjoyed a professional reputation, as a surgeon particularly, which extended beyond the boundaries of the country. That never a month passed by without a distinguished caller at the well-known house in Nelson street evidences that he was himself a most distinguished man in his profession, nor only in regard to the neatness and precision with which he executed his work, but that as a writer on subjects bearing upon his daily occupation he was held in high esteem. There is one striking proof of the regard in which he was held beyond our own country in the fact that only last year the honorary degree of doctor of medicin of St. Louis was conferred upon him in conjunction with Professor Bergmann, of Berlin, a name prominently before the public at the time of the controversy in relation to the treatment of Emperor Frederick. The honorary degree of St. Louis is conferred upon no more than two men each year, and, bearing in mind that the honor is conferred with the sanction and approval of some of the most distinguished medical men of America, it will be seen in how eminent a manner the abilities of Dr. Thomas were recognized.

He had an extensiv surgery attached to his house. There were patients from a distance who remained for weeks on the premises, and there was often a large number of his patients residing in the immediate locality of the house. These patients came from all parts of the town, and the arrivals at his surgery from day to day included cases from Rochdale, Bury, Belton, and a host of the towns clustering together in the whole of South Lancashire, and particularly the southeast. With his patients he inspired the most absolute confidence, and if there appeared to be a degree of roughness in his treatment every patient was ready to declare that Dr. Thomas had perhaps given them the very minimum of pain consistent with the due execution of his task. There was a kind and generous side to Dr. Thomas's character which was shown in his treatment of patients. On Sunday morning quite a multitude of people would avail themselvs of the opportunity of a free day to obtain the services of Dr. Thomas without cost. Poor mothers brought their children to him, and if a deformity could be rectified it was Dr. Thomas who would prove himself equal to the task. This was the work Dr. Thomas set himself on the one day in the week on which, had he cared, he might hav sought health by change of occupation and release from the strain of a profession making a severe tax upon his energies But he chose to giv himself up to a work of charity, laboring to bring relief to suffering humanity.

A Scotch Witch Trial.

From the Agnostic Journal.

One of the most miserable chapters in history is that dealing with witchcraft and its cruel punishments. Belief in the existence of this imaginary crime was universal, the finest intellects being no less infected with the prevailing superstition than the most ignorant. Witnesses could always be found who, under the sanction of the most solemn oaths, gave evidence of events and acts at once absurd, inconsistent, and impossible. Indeed, the trials, conducted with all judicial solemnity, furnish the most painful proofs of the fallibility of human testimony and the infirmity of human judgment. Judges, possessed of piety, good sense, and learning, imagined they were fulfilling all the precepts of the law by dooming miserable and trembling aged women to the stake and scaffold

Clergy, English and Scotch, persecuted those denounced for this offense with all the alacrity of the Inquisition. The cruelty of the proceedings appears enhanced by the formality and precision with which they are narrated. The following account of a trial at Kealdy is a typical instance:

THE TOWN'S PART OF EXPENSES DISBURSED EXTRAORDINARILY UPON WILLIAM COKE AND ALISON DICK:

	£	s.	d
For ten loads of coal to burn them (five merks) ...	3	6	8
For a tar barrel.....	0	14	0
For towes.....	0	6	0
For harden to be jumps for them.....	3	10	0
For making of them.....	0	8	0
For one to go to Finmouth for the laird, to sit upon their assize as judge.....	0	6	0
To the executioner for his pains.....	8	14	0
For his expenses here.....	0	16	4
Total.....	£18	1	0

The depositions on the trial are very remarkable. Alison was the wife of William Coke, and it appears from the depositions of many witnesses that she was in the habit of wrangling with her husband. The speeches on these occasions are stated in the informations to be "tending to witchcraft." She had been heard to say, "Thou hast caused many ships to go down." "It had been gude for the people of Kirkaldie that they had knit a stone round about thy neck and drowned thee."

From the evidence it would appear that this luckless couple were poor and wretched. They would bitterly curse the fishermen and the mariners; and if the storm arose, or an enemy captured the vessel, they themselve thought the evil spirit had brought on the disaster in answer to their call.

The tragedy was consummated by Alison's declaration: "Being demanded by Mr. James Simpson minister, when and how she fell into covenant with Satan, she answered that her husband many times urged her, and she yielded only two or three years since. The manner was thus: He gave her soul and body, quick and quidder, to the prince of darkness. But she in her heart said, 'God guide me.' And then she said to him, 'I shall do anything that you bid me.' And so she gave herself up to the evil spirit in the aforesaid words. This she confessed at about four hours at even, freely, and without compulsion, before Mr. James Simpson, minister; William Tennant, baillie; Robert French, town clerk; Mr. William Malcolm, schoolmaster; William Craig, and James Miller, writer hereof."

The judge sentenced both to death by burning at the stake, in accordance with the scale of costs detailed above.

Colonel Ingersoll on the Kansas Revolution.

Interviewed by a Correspondent of the Chicago Herald.

"Tell me what you think of the defeat of Senator Ingalls."

"I think that the farmers hav made up their minds that it is time for them to present a long list of grievances. As a class they work hardest and in the end hav little recompense for their labor. A young man who goes into the business of farming is liable to find at the end of ten years that he lost his health, his labor, and the land that he started with. Farmers hav just as much right to the protection of the government as the merchants, manufacturers, and speculators. The government goes to the rescue of Wall street whenever the stringency of the money market makes speculation dangerous, but the farmers are obliged to keep on paying two or three times as much for the use of money to develop and improve their farms as is charged for the use of money employed in the interests of great corporations. Mr. Ingalls underestimated the strength and sincerity of the Farmers' Alliance just as hundreds of other politicians did, but by this time he probably realizes that the farmers are in earnest."

"What do you think of the weight that Senator Ingalls's successor, Judge Peffer, will hav in the Senate?"

"Just as long as he owns himself he will hav the weight of one vote and that is enough to enable him to play see-saw successfully with a good many senators without asking them to giv him the long end of the plank. Just as long as he remains sole proprietor of himself he will be all right, and his presence in the Senate will be an influence for the good of the Farmers' Alliance. His presence in the Senate is likely to be the nucleus around which will form quite a contingent of farmers. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the farmers in their endeavor to obtain redress for grievances. There are a good many things in their new political creed that I do not believe in, but on the whole, they are in the position which Shakspere contemplated when he wrote: 'Thrice armed is he who hath his quarrel just.' I am delighted to see them aroused; to see them taking an interest at least in their own welfare. The people in towns unite easier than farmers. They hav had the benefit of organization, which means power. They know that bankers, merchants, and railroads are willing to make all they can—willing to take the last cent from the farmers. Discussion will do good. Of course, they will not do all they set out to do. But it is a good thing to find out what you can't do. The tillers of the soil are slaves in the old world, but they can be sovereigns here, and I hope that they will liv up to their privileges. I do not want their votes. I ask no favors, but I know that no country can be great if the soil is cultivated by ignorance. We need intelligence in the field—education behind the plow."

JACOB had four wives, Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah; and the abundance of his wives, as well as of his children and cattle, is spoken of as proof of the divine favor, just as it would be to-day in Utah. The element of the crime of David (the man after God's own heart), which Nathan rebuked, is not the polygamy, but the manners, in robbing Uriah of his wife, when Uriah, instead of an opulent flock of women, had only "one little ewe lamb." But it is "the Lord God of Israel" who says to David: "I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul, and I gave thee thy master's house and thy master's wives into thy bosom." It is needless to cite a single further text to prove that the God of the Old Testament directly sanctioned polygamy.—V. B. Denslow, LL.D.

DECAYING and moribund religions are, as in this vile persecution of the Jews in Russia and Germany, betaking themselvs to their last resources; they hav lost everything but their myths, once the illusion of the childhood of humanity, but now the scorn of its maturity; once accepted by ignorance, but now contradicted by science; leaving to the clinging believer, whose eyes are closed and ears stopped, no other refuge than the frightful and absurd creed, Credo quia absurdum (I believe because it is absurd)—Victor Hugo.

THEOLOGIANS no longer speak with authority. They are content to suggest and to deprecate hasty contradiction. Those who believed on trust hav passed into uncertainty. Those who uphold orthodoxy can not agree on what ground to defend it. . . . Doctrins once fixed as a rock are now fluid as water. Froude.

HONOR to him who, self complete, alone,
Carves to the grave a pathway all his own,
And, heeding not what men may think or say,
Asks but himself if doubtful of the way.
—Lord Lytton.

So Good.

From the Investigator.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1891. We can forgiv the ANNUAL for its late appearance because it is so good. The calendar for 1891 contains a vast fund of information. The review of Freethought in the United States for 1890 presents the subject in a hopeful light to those who are working for the overthrow of religious superstition in this country, while the "Story of the Year Abroad," as told by G. W. Foote, in the National Secular Society's almanac, 1891, shows the prospect equally encouraging in England. "Some Notes on Alaskan Myths," by Ida C. Craddock, is interesting to the student of ethnology. T. B. Wakeman, Esq., discourses on "Spooks," and he voices the growing conviction that "the ghosts are almost gone." "Side-lights on South Sea Missions" is a valuable article by Ada Campbell. A. B. Bradford wants the Freethought papers to discuss the tariff question, and thinks they could abandon the special antireligious work, to which they hav been devoted so long, to advantage. "Shoutin' Joe" is a humorous story with a profane religious vein running through it, by Watson Heston, that will be pronounced "immense" by all who read it. Altogether the ANNUAL for 1891 is a success. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Better Than Any One Else Could Do It.

From Secular Thought.

"Liberty in Literature: Testimonial to Walt Whitman," by Robert G. Ingersoll, with a fine portrait of the poet. This is a well-printed and neatly bound publication of the lecture delivered by Colonel Ingersoll in Philadelphia last October. It is issued by the Truth Seeker Company, and it is one of the colonel's best efforts. Whatever genius and beauty there are in "Leaves of Grass" he has presented in a form that perhaps no other living man could do. All our readers should obtain a copy. It is published at 50 cents, in paper covers 25 cents.

Mr. Talmage On Our Side.

For his sermon on the 8th the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage chose as a text the story of the irruption of frogs which covered Egypt, and, after a striking description of the horrors of such an infliction, said that the modern parallel of this curse was the spread of immoral literature.

The preacher pictured the evil by glowing words and rounded sentences that filled the church. Immoral literature, he said, is one of the most loathsome, one of the most frightful, one of the most ghastly of the ten plagues of our modern cities. There is a vast number of books and newspapers printed and published which ought never to see the light. They are filled with a pestilence that makes the land swelter with a moral epidemic. And he closed with this exhortation: "Abstain from all those books which, while they hav some good things about them, hav also an admixture of evil."

We desire to call the attention of the public to this attempt to induce people not to read obscene and bestial books even though they contain "some good things." We should hav been better pleased, however, had Mr. Talmage named some of the books under the ban, and we find ourselvs wondering how he would regard a work to which, some five weeks ago, we called the attention of Hon. John Wanamaker, postmaster-general of the United States, with a request that he act upon it officially and state whether or not it is a mailable book under the classification he makes of such works in his last report. The work in question bore a title-page as follows:

HOLY BIBLE,
CONTAINING THE
OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS:
TRANSLATED OUT OF
THE ORIGINAL TONGUES:
AND WITH THE FORMER TRANSLATIONS DILIGENTLY COMPARED AND REVISED.
NEW YORK:
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
INSTITUTED IN THE YEAR MDCCCXVI,
1890.

Of course Mr. Talmage would not hesitate an instant in deciding such a question, for he abstains from all books having even an admixture of evil, and the work in question contains several chapters which seem to us grossly vulgar, offensiv to modesty, and tending to subvert respect for decency and morality, as Mr. Wanamaker puts it in his report. Can it be that Mr. Talmage had the same book in mind when he gave the advice to abstain from all books with such admixture? It is a work very generally known and widely read, having been translated into several languages, and its circulation is pushed with much energy by a large firm in this city calling itself the "American Bible Society." If Mr. Talmage will write us that he has never seen the book we will send him one by express or messenger, as his opinion on it, now that he has so clearly stated his notion of a readable book, would be of great interest. Mr. Talmage belongs to the same denomination that has the honor of numbering among its members the postmaster-general, and perhaps he has influence with Mr. Wanamaker. We hope to enlist his activ efforts in our behalf, in this matter.

Women in the Methodist Church.

The ministers of the Methodist church are an ungrateful lot, and deserve to be spanked by the women of their churches and sent off to bed, there to meditate upon the baseness of ingratitude to benefactors.

Sixty-six per cent of the membership of that denomination is composed of women—who wear dresses. Upon their support the ministers depend for their livelihood. Without it the church would go down. A great number of these women, by far the larger portion of those who hav expressed an opinion on the subject, desire to take part in church conferences and hav something to say as to the denominational legislation affecting them. But the ministers do not propose to allow them to vote, if we may judge by the action of the ministers in the Baltimore and Philadelphia conferences, a large majority of whom hav voted against the admission of women to the general conference. This we consider base ingratitude.

Ever since the question was first mooted the women hav found their advocates among the laity of the opposit sex. A large proportion of their own sex hav been content to hug their chains, make slippers for the dear preachers, and repeat like parrots the abominable doctrins of St. Paul. And the ministers hav chuckled to themselvs and used their fair church-members as though the entire ownership of women was vested in themselvs. The preachers hav contended that to allow woman to hav anything to say about her own church affairs, beyond arranging for sociables and money-making schemes, is to advocate and adopt a method of scriptural interpretation that overturns and destroys utterly the authority of revelation as held by the church. If the plain sense of the Bible on this subject is to be set aside to accommodate modern sentiment, they argue, not a single evangelical doctrin will be safe. Whatever is displeasing to human reason or the ambitions of men will be cast out until finally the whole Bible goes.

Of course in this adherence to fossilized ideas the Christian Advocate, edited by Jim Buckley, is conspicuous, and, if the Independent be right, even infamous. The latter journal says:

"'Instant in season, instant out of season,' has been the Christian Advocate in preaching the doctrin, 'I suffer not a woman to sit in the General Conference,' reproving, rebuking, exhorting, warning. What manner of evil things are likely to follow in woman's train, if she be made eligible to membership in General Conference, it has minutely described, and it is still discussing these 'probable consequences.' Last week it expressed the opinion that such an act would be 'an act of folly unequaled in the history of any Protestant communion,' and the day it is taken 'the disintegration of the Methodist Episcopal church would begin. What an evil creature woman must be, and what a power she must hav! If she is not kept out of the General Conference the church will disintegrate. Once admit her to the ruling body and she will break the church to pieces. She will snap its bonds of unity in spite of all its godly males can do to keep them intact. If this fear be well founded, it would seem to be unwise to tolerate her at all in the church. Put her out! If she is capable of accomplishing such satanic results in the General Conference, she must be all-powerful for mischief in the Quarterly Conference, and the Sunday-school, and the prayer-meeting, and the congregation. Put her out. Let her hav a church by herself. This is the reductio ad absurdam from the Advocate's argumentum adversus feminam. But it seems to us that in the following the Advocate sinks to an argumentum ad infamiam:

"'Whatever the consequences, whatever reaction may take place in the joint movement to bring women into church or state politics, this once done will remain. Experiments in legislation as respects suffrage always modify the communaity and make a place for themselvs, as is the case with laws relating to citizenship or vested interest. Thus legalizing slavery made necessary its recognition in the Constitution and raised up an immense mass of interests and their representativs to be protected by law. Thus licensing saloons makes the organized political power of rum. So that this movement, once established,' etc., etc.

"Slavery, the saloon, woman! These are pari passu the three fontes et origines malorum!"

If Mr. Buckley can afford to put woman on the level of slavery and rum as evils afflicting the world, the women probably can. But the man who argues in this way is none the less a ruffian because he is a strict constructionist of "God's holy word."

The War of the Roses and Some Other Errors.

A copy of the "eight-page pamphlet" of which the officers of the American Secular Union wrote some time ago has reached us at last. It would probably hav got here before had the responses to the secretary's appeal for funds been more generous.

The pamphlet is a particularly pretty little work, and evidences the possession of good taste by the secretary. On the title-page is a picture in colors of the American flag—red, white, and blue, and a yellow staff—with a verse of patriotic sentiment—

"Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And freedom's banner streaming o'er us?"

This is followed by another poetical inquiry:

"Oh say, does the Star Spangled Banner yet wave O'er the land of the FREE?"

We regret, however, to see only forty stars in the flag, but we presume the secretary sees no use in counting states like New Jersey and Delaware and one or two Southern commonwealths. With this exception and the necessarily painful nature of the inquiries put, the front page of the eight-page pamphlet is a beauty.

Nor is the last page behind the first in iridescence, and one star differs from another star in glory only in the angle at which their light streams upon us. Here we hav the Pansy (from the French word pensée, meaning thought) in brighter than its natural colors—dark blue, light blue, red, yellow, green, and purple, and one who objects to wearing such a distinguishing mark should procure him a new complexion or go and learn of the G.A.R.'s. In connection with the subject of the Pansy (from the French word pensée, meaning thought) the secretary tells us "for the benefit of inquirers, that Freethought does not mean bitter denunciation of those who hold different religious views from our own." This badge is recommended for adoption, to express at first glance, without complexity of detail, the basic principle of Freedom of thought for which "Liberals of all isms are contending." On this subject the secretary glows with the enthusiasm for the beautiful so becoming young womanhood, and thus exhorts those obdurate individuals who fail to realize the necessity of a label: "Let every patriot who is a Freethinker in this sense, adopt the pansy as his badge, to be worn at all times, as a silent and unobtrusiv testimony of his principles. In this way we shall recognize our brethren in the cause, and the enthusiasm will spread; until, before long, the uplifted standard of the pansy, beneath the sheltering folds of the United States flag, shall everywhere thrill men's hearts as the symbol of religious liberty and freedom of conscience."

We mention this badge particularly because, from a letter from Otto Wettstein in the Secular Union department, it seems likely that the fuss over the "field secretary" is to be transferred to the symbols. This "war of the roses" bids fair to be more merry than the other, and we trust less bloody. Soon may we hear the secretary say:

"Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York;
And all the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean bury'd."

And Mr. Wettstein:

"If this white rose offend thy sight,
It in thy bosom bear;
'Twill blush to find itself less white,
And turn Lancastrian there."

There is a great deal better chance for poetry and fun in this conflict than in the other. Mr. Wettstein has a badge to sell and Miss Craddock a sentiment to uphold. He will get a good advertisment and she will help the manager of Mr. Wanamaker's jewelry department. Our admiration for the sex compels us to say, "Here's to the lady!" but until Mr. Wanamaker answers the letters addressed to him from this office we hope his jewelry department will go broke.

Up to this point we take it that we hav been admiring the work of the secretary, and certainly—Mr. Wettstein and Mr. Wanamaker's jewelry department to the contrary notwithstanding—the flag and the poetry and the pansy (from the French word pensée, meaning thought)—and the secretary too are worthy of our deepest feelings of reverence for the beautiful. The cover pages alone will take this little eight-paged pamphlet into the homes of the esthetic. But the work of art is not alone ornamental. There are serious matters dealt with on the inside pages; for these no doubt the president is responsible. But at the risk of being labeled one of those obtrusiv and undesirable individuals who indulge in "bitter denunciation" we shall hav to call attention to one or two serious errors of statement. As for instance:

"We hope that this call will be heeded by all truly progressiv societies, whether Spiritualist or Materialist, Unitarian or Atheist, Socialist or Individualist, Christian or non-Christian. All such societies, no matter what their differing beliefs, agree heartily in one desire—that religious liberty and the right to freedom of thought shall be upheld."

We do not believe that all Christian societies desire religious liberty. If they do they choose curious ways to show such belief. If they do desire it, why pass Sunday laws, or blasphemy laws? or force Thanksgivings upon the people? or chaplains upon the legislatures? It seems to us that the laws the Union is trying to repeal (is the Union trying to repeal any laws?) are evidence in themselvs that all Christians are not desirous of religious liberty for others. Even the Unitarians look upon the average Freethinker as a "blatant" person whom society should sit down upon. And it is a great cause of grief to them that such persons will not stay sat upon, but insist upon squirming around and making things uncomfortable for the sitters.

Another serious error of phraseology is the use of the word "sectarian" when "religious" is really, or should be, meant. Non-sectarian, but religious, societies, are the very ones the Union is trying, or ought to be trying, to keep from stealing public funds. The chaplains in our legislatures make non-sectarian prayers. Thanksgiving and fast days are non-sectarian periods of religious foolishness. The oath is a non-sectarian superstition. What the Union was really organized to accomplish is to get religion out of the way in our government—religion of all stamps and stripes, from the Roman Catholic to Theistic Unitarianism—Gods of all degrees of incomprehensibility, from the Jewish Jehovah to the most attenuated Unknowable of the philosophers. Clear them out, sweep them away, and let the people govern themselvs.

And we object to the statement also that the religious enthusiasts who are threatening our public schools are "well-meaning but thoughtless." They are not well-meaning at all! They mean to use the schools supported by public funds to further and foster and sustain their particular and pet superstitions, and this is not well. It is as bad as it can be, and we hope the president of the Secular Union will in the next edition of this eight-paged pamphlet revise its text. The flag and the pansy (from the French word pensée, meaning thought) are all right, and may they stand 'gainst all of York's assaults! but it is giving away our case to pat the church on the back, ready to say Good Lord, Good Devil, as the wind sets. The church has a dagger for fifth ribs which she has never been slow to use. Let us hav the text revised, because it does not truly giv the attitude of the Union, and if we must hav internecine strife, let it be this war of the roses. There's fun in that.

"Let me be umpire in this dreadful strife.
I see no reason, if I wear this rose,
That anyone should therefore be suspicious
I more incline to Somerset than York:
Both are my kinsmen, and I love them both."

Editorial Notes.

THE Christian Advocate prints in its last issue two paragraphs about the last Congress. In one Dr. Buckley says that notwithstanding its faults the country would be worse off without a Congress than with one. Why the thought occurs to him is explained in the second paragraph: "Congress, in its closing hours, passed a bill granting $10,000 for the grading and extending of Massachusetts avenue to the site of the National University of the Methodist Episcopal church." Ten thousand dollars ought to purchase a favorable opinion!

BY Dunlap's special cable comes this dispatch to the Press from Berlin: "The Roman Catholic authorities in Treves announce that the holy coat of Joseph, the husband of Mary, will be exhibited during the summer, when it is expected a pilgrimage from the entire Catholic population of Germany will be made to view it. The garment was recently inspected by learned clerical experts, and by them has been pronounced genuin." "Learned clerical experts" is good; it would hav been better, however, had the last word been liars. But it is humiliating to reflect that there are human beings who will believe the story.

THE Chicago Sabbatarian fanatics hav formed a "Columbian Sunday Association." The object is "to prevent injustice to the fifty thousand or more employees of the Columbian Fair and related industries by opening the Exposition on Sunday," and "to arrange for and carry on great mass meetings on the Sundays during the season of the World's Exposition, to be addressed by distinguished speakers on themes appropriate to the day. Chorus singing to be a feature of these meetings." How about the speakers and chorus singers? Don't they need protection too? And then the audiences—will not they violate the Sabbath in attending mass meetings quite as flagrantly as by visiting the Fair? Out upon such hypocrisy!

ASSEMBLYMAN DRYPOLCHER wants the legislature to pass a bill providing that St. Michael's Home in Richmond county may care for destitute children, and may receive a per capita allowance of the public funds devoted to such purpose in the same manner as other similar institutions. That is to say he wants the state to pay two dollars per week for each pauper child of drunken and debauched Irish parents that police justices can be induced to commit to the home. That is the way the Catholic church keeps its membership up. And Mr. Blumenthal on the same day asked the legislature to exempt from taxation property at Rockaway Beach owned by a Hebrew society and used as a sanitarium for Hebrew children. Why should the state help support a lot of sick Jewish children and not the sick children of all the people?

THE arrogant hoggishness of Roman Catholicism, a cult which assumes to own the country, is again brought prominently forward. This time it is a Roman Catholic member of the New York Assembly, and the point is made sharper by the fact that the member, a saloon-keeping Irishman, is so ignorant that he wrote his motion so as to substitute himself for St. Patrick as Ireland's "patron saint." This is the resolution offered in New York's Assembly chamber on Friday, March 12th:

"Resolved, If the senate concur, that when the legislature adjourns on Monday evening, it be until Wednesday morning, in commemoration of the birthday of Ireland's patron saint, T. D. Sullivan."

The resolution as written was laughed out of the house and ruled out of order by the speaker. But the mover could not see what his fellow-members were laughing at.

A NICE little tale comes from New Haven dated coincidently with the recent visit of John E. Remsburg to that city. It reads: "The French Catholics of this city are in a state of excitement over what they call a miracle. A former member of the church while indulging in the most terrible blasphemy was stricken with paralysis a few days ago and is now unable to speak. The man's name is Louis Le May. A number of friends had called on him to persuade him to attend church, when he began to denounce church, religion, and priests. The next minute Le May, it is said, was seen to grow rigid. His arms drew up convulsivly and he gasped for breath. He endeavored to speak but could not utter a word. The persons who witnessed the sudden and fearful stroke at once pronounced it a visitation of providence. They were completely awed by the man's condition." As we said, it is a nice little tale—and also a nice little lie.

NEW YORK has another Elliott F. Shepard in the editor of the Recorder, a new venture in daily journalism which is trying to make money take the place of brains in pushing itself to the front. Hear him:

"No man should be allowed to openly insult and outrage the feelings of a church-going community. There stands upon the corner of Fifth avenue and 55th street in this town the walls of what was a beautiful church edifice, a building solemnly consecrated to the worship of God. The front of that building is now decorated with flaming showbills of theatrical performances. Take them down! The front of a church is not the place for circus posters."

The facts are, this old church building was given up as a church and used to exhibit paintings in. The interior was burnt out, and afterward the building was sold to a Jew, who allows its ruined walls to be made bulletin boards. The editor of the Recorder talks like a full-fledged fool. There is within a stone's throw of this office an old church now used as a theater itself, and worst of all, the plays put on its stage are villainous. Why not shriek about that? What difference is there between a brick or stone "solemnly consecrated to the worship of God" and a brick or stone not so treated? "Outraging the feelings of a church-going community"—bosh!

WE noticed a week or two ago the Freedom of Worship bill now before the New York legislature, stating its object to be to effect an entrance for priests into the Randall's island House of Refuge. The Times now comments upon the bill and says that while the effort is not likely to succeed any more than those that hav been made so many times before, there is evidence that some sinister influence is working against the House of Refuge elsewhere than at Albany. The number of commitments to that institution made by the magistrates of this city has been diminishing in a mysterious manner. For several years prior to 1888 they had exceeded 200 annually, sometimes reaching 300 or more, but in that year the number fell to 137. In 1889 it was 136, and last year it was only 67. Has there been such a gratifying reduction in the number of juvenil delinquents, or hav they been sent elsewhere? During the year 1889, when 136 children were committed to the House of Refuge, 851 were sent to the Roman Catholic Protectory, to which the city pays for their support a good deal more than it costs. Apparently, concludes the Times, the priests, who are unable to do their proselyting in the public institutions, hav found some means of getting the objects of their solicitude sent to their own institution, where they can take care of their religion and get a proportionate amount of the public funds for their pains.

WHAT shall we think of the Rev. Mr. Driver, who has been posing, as we learn, in the Northwest as the redoubtable champion of Christianity who met and overcame Colonel Ingersoll? His reputation was the greater, as if this were true he is the only Christian who ever "debated" with Colonel Ingersoll on even equal terms, as the world acknowledges. Judge Black, Dr. Field, Mr. Gladstone, and others who hav put lance in rest against him, hav been unhorsed and sent limping from the lists. The colonel's controversial victories over his opponents hav been admitted in every case even by those who did not share his views. But Dr. Driver, when a few thousand miles away, said he had debated with and overcome the great Agnostic, and the Young Men's Christian Associations which employed this new Christian David advertised the self-asserted victory with much assiduity. But mark how plain a tale shall put him down:

"LAW OFFICE OF ROBT. G. INGERSOLL, 45 WALL STREET,
"NEW YORK, Feb. 14, 1891.

"D. W. SMITH, ESQ., Port Townsend, Wash., Dear Sir: Your letter was only brought to my attention this week on my return from several weeks' absence.

"I never 'debated' with 'Dr. Driver' in my life—only met him incidentally once, that I remember—and I am not sure of that once, but my secretary says he thinks I met him once—or rather he met me at one of my lectures somewhere in Oregon.

"However, the matter is not worth attention.

"Thanking you for your kind letter, and Mr. C. B. Reynolds for his remembrance, I am, yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

And now "Dr." Driver has lost his reputation among his honest friends, and there is none so poor to do him reverence. Lying does not pay.

THE Independent has at last attained to omniscience. It knows precisely who is and who is not to be saved. It proclaims that knowledge in these words: "Those to whom the gospel is made known, or who hav the means of such knowledge, and hence hav the opportunity of acceptance by repentance and faith, must, by these exercises, accept that gospel, or die under the penal curse of sin. Compliance with these gospel terms of salvation, on the part of all such persons, is the one thing to be done, and that must be done, and if here they refuse, no matter for what reason, then, for this compliance there is no substitute and no equivalent." The people affected by this law it calls the "rejecters of the gospels," and thus describes them: "All persons are such rejecters who, having the knowledge of the gospel or the means of such knowledge, for any reason fail to accept it by compliance with the conditions which it prescribes. They may be open and undisguised Infidels, with their heads and their mouths full of objections to Christianity; or they may not be such, and may be simply careless and thoughtless persons, living for this world and for its transient pleasures. But in either event, the one fact which puts upon them the stamp of gospel rejecters is their own non-compliance with its conditions of salvation. This fact exists with knowledge or the means of knowledge, and it is, moreover, a positiv and voluntary attitude of the mind, without any invincible ignorance or absolute necessity, but a matter of free choice, and that, too, in circumstances which make the opposit choice alike possible and obligatory. All such persons of every grade and type of character are embraced in the one category of gospel rejecters. The Jews, as a people, in the time of Christ were, and since that time generally hav been, such rejecters. Millions of others in Christian lands belong to the same class." What a crowd there will be in hell!

So Much the Worse for the Country.

From the Sun.

That able, lurid, and highly sulphurous journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, is insidiously and satanically booming in its correspondence the nomination of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll for president of the United States! Though demons may wag their fiery tails in fiendish joy at the thought of Bob, their own Bob, running hell-bent for election, they are still doomed to disappointment. Colonel Ingersoll will not accept the nomination.

Letters from Friends.

COLVILLE, WASH., Feb. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You can count on me as a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can pay for it. I cannot do without it and be happy. There are a great many Infidels in this county, but very few outspoken Liberals. Mr. Putnam lectured here last fall, and there was a good turn out each night. C. B Reynolds is doing good work on the sound. I hope by next fall we can hav him with us on the east side of the state. Yours for liberty and truth, C. H. PROUTY.

GLENORA, N. Y., March 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I regret that my idle scribbling on vacant land should hav so disturbed the stomach of friend Gunther. But lacking "sense enough to stop writing," let me tell of other things I "don't know"—for instance, where the millions of acres are that are "waiting for some one to come and take them." Government, they say, has no more cultivable land, and has doubled its price on what it has. It looks as if somebody wanted vacant land. Settlers report to me that no tolerably good land can be had in California but at speculators' prices. My daily paper says that a large tract of cultivated land opposit Pembina, and a large part of Fargo and Grand Forks, is likely to fall into the maw of the Great Northern railroad; but I "don't know" whether these are the "idle people who do not want vacant land, but cultivated farms" and city property that they may "reap the benefit of others' labor," to whom Mr. Gunther refers. In another paper I read that ten men own 229,000 of the 365,000 acres in Marin county, Cal; and that there are but 102 land-owners in that county outside of city and town lots Mr. Gunther should enlighten us as to which class of idle people he refers to. J. K. INGALLS.

NORTH, UTAH, Feb. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In response to the inquiry made by your correspondent from New Mexico, I will say that during more than twenty years I hav frequently been on the site of the Mountain Meadows massacre, and hav never seen any unusual desolation there. Since the massacre, a man named Daniel Sill, and others, hav herded large flocks of sheep there, and herds of horses and cattle range over the country. Otherwise than as these stock keep the range, near the spring, closely cropped, the Mountain Meadows raise as good crops of grass, sage brush, and oak brush as usual. Snow and rain, heat and cold, and all the elements, are just as propitious now as they were before the Arkansas travelers camped on the Meadows; and the propitiation offered up in the person of John D Lee has not in the least affected the vegetable productions of that place.

It is a pity that people should so industriously strain the truth in trying to sustain their superstitions. It is my opinion that half told truths are a part of the food on which superstition is fed.

I know of any number of ranges in the Western country that, under similar conditions, hav been eaten out equally with the Mountain Meadows, and, of course, look equally desolate. GEORGE A. BURGON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Feb. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The blanks received in THE TRUTH SEEKER for circulation petitioning Congress not to permit the Columbian Fair to be held at Chicago in 1892 to be closed on Sunday, are received weekly. On receipt of the first one I attempted to circulate it, but soon found the labor in my condition would be too much, and passed the blanks to interested friends. But it seems to me impossible that the government can pursue so suicidal a course, with the result of the Centennial fair at Philadelphia fresh in their memory, and I will not believe it possible that in the intelligence of the present day it can be closed on that day. I think the church might as well attempt to prevent the sun from rising on that day, only permitting it to rise on a week-day. Miss Marie C. J. Mayer, a much-esteemed young lady among her associates, who has been pursuing her studies the past two years in Paris, informs me personally that the American department at the French fair in Paris was kept obstinately closed on Sunday, to the inconvenience of her and her fellow-pupils, who had no other time to visit it. It must be humiliating to the American church-goer to see the wild geese flying over the steeples of the churches in their yearly migrations north and south, beyond the reach of rifle-shot, on Sunday. GEO. M. DAVENPORT.

TYNGSBORO, MASS, Feb 26 291.

To W. L. WILLIS, Kokomo, Ind: As a member and authorized representativ of the Brotherhood of Moralists, I reply to your adverse epistle addressed to them and printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 14, 1891.

You being, as you say, "not an Anarchist, Communist, superstitionist, religionist, immoralist, or Spiritualist," you do not appear to be cataloged with the inadmissibles to the Brotherhood of Moralists; and what you offer as reasons for not uniting therewith, after several invitations to join, seem to me to be irrelevant, no matter whether or not your claim to knowledge of life after death is well grounded in scientifically demonstrated facts. The Brotherhood of Moralists calls for knowledge, and if you hav it, and can show, as you say you know, that when man dies he livs again, you above all others would and should be most welcome to our family circle, over twelve hundred strong—beating the twelve apostles a hundred to one. As says the editor of the Moralist, the organ of the Brotherhood, "We trust our readers will not infer that the Brotherhood of Moralists, as an organization, is committed to the non-immortality doctrin. . . . No person is excluded from the Brotherhood of Moralists or expelled therefrom for believing in a deity or a life after death." It is the primary principle of the order, as written in its constitution and explained in its "Defense," that reason is the only criterion of conduct, and therefore whoever acknowledges reason—human intelligence—as final authority, and behaves himself accordingly, is acceptable and desirable as a member. Like yourself, "I am an Atheist; I know all Gods and all religions are frauds. I am a naturalist; everything that is is natural." And so say we all of us.

JOHN P. GUILD.

ELSINORE, CAL., Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In this country of Atheists and Infidelity to the church, we are not entirely God-forsaken, as the few religious people are willing to testify. Our rainy season occurs between October and April, but this time it begins to look as if we would hav a dry winter. Old-timers, however, saw indications of a storm, and the Spanish priests, who are all old-timers, therefore ordered prayer to be offered, a mass. Of course the Lord heard them and the rain came. It seems, however, that they did not limit his Lordship to any given amount, and within five days no less than 10 inches of rain hav fallen, doing great damage. Our Elsinore lake, which is a body of water three by eight miles, has raised six feet and is now discharging to the sea. Is it not time that our state legislature is taking some hand in this matter of prayer? Are these religious cranks to rule us indoors and out and call down rain without limit? It seems to me that the statute should provide that any priest, minister of the gospel, deacon, or other religious person, or any person at all having influence with any God, Holy Ghost, messiah, or other supernatural being residing in the clouds and having unlimited power, who willfully uses such influence in prayer and causes rain to fall in quantities of more than two inches at any one time, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon proof thereof any such priest, minister, deacon, or person having used such influence with any said God, messiah, Ghost, or supernatural power shall be adjudged guilty and punished and fined, as in other cases of crimes enumerated in this code.

The matter has already gone too far. Here we are in Elsinore now with railroads washed away, bridges swept into the lake, wagon-roads torn up, and flour daily rising in price, with the gloomy prospect that we shall hav to subsist on green alfalfa hay for two or three weeks.

Very truly, F. H. HEALD.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Some few weeks ago a story was started by some ignorant and credulous person in one of the country districts of Minnesota, that a certain woman had given birth to a devil. It was reported to the daily papers of Minneapolis and St. Paul, and, without farther investigation at the time, published. The press throughout the country of course took it up, each editor tampering with it to suit his or her own particular belief, until now I am informed by communications from Liberal friends in different parts of the country, who wish to know the truth in the case, that credulous, superstitious Christians are reporting it as a case of "divine vengeance upon an Infidel woman who had blasphemed Jesus Christ."

In order to giv some idea of the credulity and superstition exhibited in these reports I take the following from a communication received from a Liberal friend in New York. He says: "All the French papers of Canada are publishing an incredible report of divine vengeance on an Infidel near Minneapolis, to the effect that about two months ago a Mrs. M. blasphemed the name of Jesus Christ, and that about three weeks later she gave birth to a devil completely covered with hair two inches long, and with two horns and a long tail, and claws instead of nails; and that the infernal kid was not five minutes old when he jumped out of bed and began his career of raising hell, and that now, though only five weeks old, he is the terror of the neighborhood, and the whole state of Minnesota in a stir over the matter." (Is it not a sad predicament that we in Minnesota are in?) Other communications hav accounts of similar reports, and request the truth in the case; so I hav thought it best to ask you to publish the facts in your paper for the benefit of all Liberal friends who are not in a position to obtain them first-hand.

Shortly after the story was first published, a number of physicians went from Minneapolis and St. Paul to investigate the matter, and found that there was not a word of truth in it. The papers hav since stated that it was a complete fabrication.

It is the work of the old trinity—ignorance, credulity, and superstition. People who hav adopted a scientific way of thinking do not giv credence to any such reports. Here we hav an illustration of how a story or report, perhaps with no foundation, perhaps with some common natural occurrence as a foundation, gets magnified to enormity in a few weeks in these enlightened times, with the press to make records. How, then, can we put credence in those miraculous stories of the Bible, which were passed around orally for a generation or so before they were written?

LEROY BERRIER.

KOKOMO, IND, March 1, 1891.

MISS ELLA E. GIBSON: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 28th you make some remarks on my article of February 14th, in which I affirm that the Brotherhood of Moralists hav pledged themselvs not to investigate spirit phenomena nor allow, if possible, anyone else to do so; and I also said, this is the obvious meaning of their obligation; and if I hav made "a false statement" I am not aware of it. The papers I hav received from the Brotherhood justify me in saying what I hav said, or I do not understand the language used.

By following the directions which I gave, "amusing, forty years old, and out of date" as they are (with this wise lady) knowledge of life after so-called death can be got, knowledge which you hav fought and are now fighting against, and you would prevent anyone from using these means or any other to get this knowledge. You may deny this, but the sneer exhibited in the language you use, consciously or unconsciously to you, givs you away.

I will inform you that I was not "caught on a table." I used altogether other processes in my investigation. The one I gave is the easiest understood and observed by investigators who hav little or no knowledge on this subject.

I hav seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER articles from you claiming that what are called spirit phenomena are or hav been about you, and you claim to understand and be familiar with these things. Now, you will do me a great favor by stating what phenomena there hav been about you. Giv all the particulars of each phase, and especially explain the cause, so others can learn how to get the same. You are so much wiser than I am that surely you can make the whole matter clear, and then perhaps investigators will be able, by your instructions, to dispense with that "clean" table that "amuses" you so much.

Please do not forget to relate the full particulars of how you saw, from your house in the East to Liberal, Mo., what was going on there when "poor Walser" was getting fuddled by the spirits. Tell how you did this, and giv directions how others can see things at so great a distance.

I made a similar request of you once before, but you were as silent as you suppose the so-called dead to be. Now, I mean business. I am a truth seeker, and I beg you to do your part by telling all you know about spirit phenomena.

Now is the time for you to present the "truth" you possess and use your "good sense" to make the same clear to the understanding of the common mind. If you are anxious to "save" me, as you call it, do not giv it up with "I can't." Please try, and greatly oblige,

Yours for truth, W. L. WILLIS.

BLOOMDALE, O., Feb. 15, 291.

MR. EDITOR: In view of the present controversy about tactics to be pursued by the American Secular Union, a voice "from the gallery" might not be out of place if you will kindly grant me space for a few minutes.

Dr. Westbrook's mode of action to me seems much too mild and gentle—like striking a man in the face and then begging to be excused, or like a man about to set fire to another man's house but previously notifying him of his intention. In time of war each army prepares for battle and does not send its scouts into the enemy's lines to expose its plans. When old Napoleon wished to giv battle he concocted his plans on the spur of the moment and sent his men out for the immediate execution of these plans. From his achievements we may learn that bold and precipitate action generally leads to success. We want to ridicule the church to death; to attack her as she attacks us, without mercy, without gloves. If we wish to please the church and not ourselvs, we could not do this better than by holding our tongues; that would suit them best of all.

You will pardon me if I say a few words in reference to myself. Having received numerous Freethought papers with requests to become a subscriber, it grieves me to say I am so situated as to make it impossible to do so laudable an act. And every time you call for help, as in the case of Jeremiah Hacker, Wm. Hart, and others, my heart aches because I cannot respond to these calls. It gave me pleasure to see how Samos Parsons, of California, donated. Most of the Liberals, I believe, when they were still Christians gave freely to that worse than useless cause, and now since their mental emancipation should do doubly well for this great and good cause.

I here affix, as the rest of my letter, some ideas jotted down as they pass through my mind. They may not be new, but what is new under the sun?

To employ the ignorance and prejudice of the masses is to take hold of the lever of Archimedes with which he proposed to move the world.

The ideas of heaven and hell are both children of the human brain, and hav no existence in facts. One of them is a place where all wish to go, and they wish it for their friends; the other is a place where no one wants to go, and all wish it for their enemies.

Knock down as much of the church edifice as you can at every opportunity, and hold up the tree of knowledge as long as you liv.

Our wishes do not establish anything in the realm of nature; if they did, our prayers might be of some value.

To engage in what is commonly called a brave fight is what I term a misapplication of force.

One of the joys of the priesthood is a lot of young people who attend Sunday-school with regularity; and I might add, their greatest joy is a powerful congregation who attend and pay well. C. C. GERMANN.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Your complaint against the transmission through the mails of a certain book entitled, "The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments: translated out of the Original Tongues," etc., which in your honest opinion is "obscene," "lewd," and "lascivious," is highly commendable, and should meet the approbation of every moral person in the country. The very many passages which you hav cited in your complaint are certainly most grossly "offensiv to modesty, and tend to subvert respect for decency and morality." Millions of copies of the book complained of hav passed through the mails decade after decade, and never before, to my knowledge, has there been a complaint entered against the book. The only reason I can giv for this state of things is that the work in its entirety has not been read and examined as to its whole contents, for certainly no refined and moral-minded person can read the entire work, passing through your citations and many others not mentioned, without becoming disgusted and blushingly ashamed of its rampant lewdness, obscenity, and lasciviousness, wholly unfit for pure minds to deliberate upon for one moment. There is not a single church congregation in the land nor an assemblage of decent and respectable men and women that would tolerate in their presence and hearing the reading of the passages to which you hav called the attention of the post-office department for a decision. Not a single woman constituting these assemblages would remain in the church or social gatherings, and if any of the men remained it would be only to punish the impious immoralist who by reading the vile literature referred to insulted their wives and daughters. There is not one person out of one hundred that knows anything about the vast amount of the immoralities, debauchery, licentiousness, and vileness contained in this book. and when a believer in it is apprised of its obscenity and impurity, and absolute unfitness for the present age as a book upon which to base a high-toned, sound morality, he at once becomes enraged and even abusiv, and says that it is a history of the times in which it was written, and the wickedness, debauchery, and all the vileness had to be given to be a guardian against the commission of these evils by future generations. Hav not these historical accounts been a most damnable curse to the world? Hav they not degraded the human race? Hav they not polluted the human mind? Hav they not been an incubus to civilization? Yet this stenchful Jewish literature is claimed to be for the world's good, written by divine inspiration, by Jewish barbarians inspired by a barbaric God. I am for driving such a God out of heaven, out of hell, out of the world, out of the nation, out of the state, out of society, out of the home, out of the human mind. While God and the book complained of exist where human beings are, there can be no human liberty, no true happiness, and man cannot attain to his highest possibilities. Since you hav earnestly sought for a decision whether the volume entitled the "Holy Bible" is or is not an immoral book within the meaning of the law, I hope you will press the matter to a conclusion, as you seem to be determined to do. Can Mr. Wanamaker, after being applied to, refuse to entertain your request? If so, by what right can he or his department ignore an American citizen's request, especially so important a one, which interests the body politic? In Mr. Wanamaker's own language, he cannot possibly refuse to act in your case without becoming a lawbreaker. This important case will be watched with very much interest.

L. De Witt Geiswold.

Lexington, Ky., March 8, 1891.

Mr Editor: We hav listened with pleasure to a lecture by Miss Sybil Carter, a foreign missionary. She slanders the Buddhists, although they hav expounded beautifully the idea that we are our own gods.

A human being is a powerful organization, the highest form of natural force, the cause of causes. Dame Nature stoops from her pedestal to recognize an intelligent will, unaffected by a "passing fancy." What has the might of a locomotiv to do with the passing breeze?

This hint reminds me that the Freethought cause is now affected by every "passing breeze." It requires a powerful organization, so perfect and complete that it will almost move itself. Don't the Masons and the Catholics know that this is so? Then, with truth on our side, who can stand against us? Big heads and bayonets will hav their own task to perform, without dissensions. Those lack-luster and frozen faculties called intuitions we do not adhere to so much as to spontaneous motivs and acts which are the offspring of well-advised judgment and gentle experience. If you wish to advance the Freethought cause, send a loaf of bread to the starving Christian, insulted daily by some church—also a dime, to buy coal oil and an Infidel tract. You may look for results.

The best part of our machinery is to be found in the sweet impulses of nature—in good deeds, sympathy, love, and kindness. I saw the other day a very pious woman giv a kick to a very sweet little girl living with her, Sarah Wells, for a trifle. Mary Lutson, a larger girl, who hates Sunday-schools, drew her into her arms and kissed the face of the sobbing victim all over, then placed her in her own mother's doorway, singing to her a lovely song. I carried fruit to them, what little I had, and thus we had a pleasant time. The vixen disappeared.

Do not discourage Mr. Charlesworth. He knows what to do with bayonets and kind words too.

But the hardest problem to solve is to draw a house. A lecture on a literary subject will always call out hearers—a lecture such as we might expect from an Infidel. Then if a few leave the house, those who remain will be benefited. The sale of tickets will enable the lecturer to giv a tract to each person present.

We are told that nature is always struggling to revert to original types of organized being. Truly the mills of the gods grind slowly. Life and Freethought are the only antidotes to inertia and fear—the last a demon that haunts the mind to cause it to return to the idea of God. Lest some maddening passion may in the future hav power to rearouse some wolfish instinct in the human heart which we thought had passed into oblivion, let us stand firm.

Even Miss Carter, the sweet missionary, would fain waste money in building churches in which we should be reminded of Shadrach & Co., whose performance rivals the Indian fire of the suttees. Modern jugglers bathe the hand in a solution of alum, vitriol, and onion juice, after which they are able to take up red-hot coals of fire without injury.

Miss Carter would carry the human race to the threshold of sensual religion, when the pleasure of a refined experience is more exquisit than gold of Ophir, more precious than costly gems.

Some Christians imagin that even the benevolence of Cato at a political crisis was injurious to Rome. Others sav that the Epicureans ruined the most stable commonwealth in the world. Epicurus lived, with his disciples, on barley cakes and water from the spring. Temperance in all things, was his style of luxury. He thought good behavior was conducivto happiness. It was Cardinal Gibbons who misunderstood the maxims of this great philosopher. A man is not a sybarite who finds happiness in virtue. Colonel Ingersoll (our future president, I hope) does not attribute improvements to religion. Perhaps he thinks good principles are more important than creeds. If a Christian nation is sinking, the righteous always say "a little more religion would prop it up."

The fine arts are a hindrance to vulgarity and coarseness. If a people are wrecked, let them die genteelly.

I hav been burnt out, and cruelly persecuted. Please remit something to Mr. Macdonald for my relief. I will send in return a portrait of Mr. Bennett, or Ingersoll (oil painting), or Mr. Macdonald, if I could get his photograph. A registered letter is best for this place. Alhaza.

Lincoln, Neb., March 1, 1891.

Mr. Editor: During the interim of silence upon my part I hav eagerly watched the columns of the grand old Truth Seeker, and hav with persistent and growing interest read every thought projected by the different advocates of Liberal organization, and am astonished that so few hav so far pointedly expressed themselvs, when certainly so many must surely be in favor of such a measure. But then, I am fully aware that all great reforms come slowly, but nevertheless surely. Yet I cannot refrain from fanning the feeble flames at every opportune moment, hoping that soon the proper fuel will be added which will start such a combustion and emit such heat that it will at once warm up every Liberal (and there are quite a number in our city of sixty thousand inhabitants) to such an extent that he will be able to throw off this dormancy and enter the work with renewed life. Let us keep the pot boiling; the end is not yet. And ere long some one will hit upon a method or devise some plan or plans that may be favorable enough for general adoption. Nearly all organizations that hav sprung up and reached proportions worthy of note hav been at first crude emanations from some enthusiastic mind, yet the refining processes of sifting the gross matter through successiv, but perhaps not greater, minds, has seldom failed to either establish the matter as wholly practicable, demonstrable, or useless. And thus it will be in the case of Liberal organization—the seed must be properly planted; and in this boasted "land of the free" we hav the soil especially adapted for its reception. The brawn and brain of the Liberal element of this country will watch with interest its first appearance as it shoots forth watered by the pure refreshing of Freethought and nurtured by the sunbeams of reason, and will vie with each other in keeping it free from the choking influences of Christian weeds, clods, and superstition; and after a healthy growth is assured we surely can find some one who will champion our great cause until the harvest shall come and its fruits shall gladden and make merry with benefits the hours of all who now are unable in its absence to enjoy them on account of the creed-bound laws that govern all institutions that hav so far been instituted for the relief of the fellow-man in the struggles incident to human life. I say, Onward! the victory can be won.

Just now there seems to be quite an agitation through the columns of The Truth Seeker in regard to the Spiritual philosophy, and I like "Veritas," from Port Huron, S. D. for his frankness in stating his belief in the communication of spirits with the denizens of earth. Yet I am myself more nearly situated like H. H. Philbrick, of Havana, Ill. I hav been an honest investigator of this occult force (for I deem it a force) for twenty-six years, and I am not yet of the opinion that the varied phenomena or any of them that I hav ever witnessed are the work of decarnated spirits. It is true, I hav witnessed many problems that I could not solve and that I think would be useless to giv to Brother Wettstein Yet when I am through investigating, if I ever am, if I hav indubitable evidence that it is not the work of spirits, then I will step fearlessly and without any compunctions upon the broad Materialistic platform upon which Brother Wettstein so grandly stands. During my period of investigation it has been my fortune to meet with many honest mediums, and a great many dishonest ones—at least, so I believed—and my deductions are that there is a force outside of the medium and the sitter. Yet what that force is I am totally at a loss to explain, and so far, unless some good Materialist can mathematically or otherwise demonstrate that it is not the work of spirits once endowed with forms in earth-life but who hav passed through the change called death or dissolution, then the Spiritualist has the best of the argument, because I cannot see how anyone who will honestly and fearlessly investigate can deny that these manifestations do take place but in so many instances are unexplainable. Hence the honest believer, having sufficient evidence, calls it Spiritualism. The Materialist shakes his head, looks wise, and when asked how and by what means these phenomena are produced at once exclaims, Fraud! I will not attempt to giv in this article any of my experiences. I hav already encroached upon the space of others. Suffice it to say that all I hav witnessed has been witnessed by hundreds of others, with much more that I hav not had the time or opportunity of seeing, and the testimony of thousands can be recorded in this same line whose opinions and whose statements for truth and veracity none ought to question.

Yours for truth, J. H. Guthrie.

Kent, O., March 1, 1891.

Mr. Editor: Will it be in order to call our Secular and Freethinking leaders to a halt? I, for one, am always ready to read articles from Brothers Watts, Burnham, Westbrook, Foote, et al ("stars in our Freethought sky") but I really think the "rancid" discussion now going on in defense of each other's past "views and good intentions" as regards the proper and best way to promulgate Freethought to our people, should be brought to a close, for the following reasons: 1. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." "In union there is strength." "Charge on our enemy and not our friends." 2. We must leave the Christians in both precept and practice, and it is not best to preach unity, via science, and practice individual destruction, via superstition.

The past has shown its terrors through the door of ignorance, not because our ancestors were not honest in their intentions, but because they themselvs were crude, living in a crude age. The present has risen above the idolatrous age of individual and saintly worship, and we no longer should pay our tribute of devotion to either ourselvs or others, but to principles and charity. I hav no doubt but that the combatants and advisers in the little war now waging are eager to "bury the hatchet" and "work together for the good of the Lord" (elevation of men). A little oil scattered on the troubled waters will calm the surging waves.

I used to clerk for an architect—i. e., I cut the timber down and he drew the plans for putting it up again—and I learned that it required the best timber to make shingles, and that a good roof was requisit to preserve peace in the family, for "a leaky roof makes a scolding wife." For my part, I think that any one of our great speakers is good enough to make shingles, foundation sills, or finishing lumber, and that it will take all of them, also us little nails, to make the great edifice of Freethought (we must be hit on the head to be driven).

I feel like saying, Eugene, you are a "brick," for you hav at last struck the key-note, in showing up Wanamaker, Comstock, & Co. in their unscrupulous way of keeping "obscene, lewd, and lascivious" books out of the mails. But, Brother Macdonald, don't you know you will cast a lasting disgrace upon God's book? You naughty Eugene, I will hav Mr. Heston "show you up" in picture, for you must not be so vile, and if my father, his father, and his father's father were alive they would say, "you Infidel wretch." However, I do not care; I do not suppose I can go where they are, for they "cast their burdens on the Lord," and I am trying to carry mine myself.

A word, please, to T. E. Longshore, who I think is rather premature in some of his logical conclusions, in his "condemnation act" vs W. L. Willis in "Spiritology" in The Truth Seeker of February 28th. While I am no Spiritualist or Spiritologist, I "know sometings" that tells me "I don't know some other tings," and what I don't know is what I am seeking, and while in the field of research I am willing to hav "all the conditions" right so that no fog shall obscure the sun in its attempt to reach the earth and make its light known to me in all manner of ways. Mr. Longshore says, "Knowledge obtained without the use in acquiring it of all or of the majority of the senses," etc., "cannot be safely trusted." I would ask Brother Longshore how many of his senses he brings into use to add up a column of figures. He certainly cannot hear, feel, or smell the figures or the amount when added. The sun shines; we see it and feel the heat, no more. We see and smell a rose—two out of five. We see two bodies approach each other, say it is "attraction," yet cannot hear, smell, feel, or taste it—only one in five. He seems to vote against "conditions," and I think conditions are necessary in all things. A combination of conditions only can giv us our electric light; the least fault in the dynamo, conductors, or circuit will endanger the light. And even an arc-light of great candle-power cannot be seen by a blind man—optical condition bad. Science reaches of but three forms of material—solids, liquids, and gases. We can see and feel the solids (some of them can be tasted, and others can be heard when in motion). The liquids can be seen and felt, and some of them smelt. The gases can be learned but from two or three at most of the five senses. A cloudy condition obscures the rays of the sun, yet it shines "all the same." A clean table is a fine thing, even to eat on, saying nothing about inviting "angelic spirits of the departed" to dine with us and teach us of the hereafter; and if they can know, write, or materialize better with a "low lamp," let us yield to them. As this is my first time on earth, that I know of, I do not wish to dictate to the spirits how they shall do or ask (I may be able to change the conditions hereafter to suit Brother Longshore), and will listen as best I can.

I am not disposed to think all persons fools or deceived because they see things that I cannot or are easier convinced than myself, for I may be wrong. I hav friends who call me a fool (and I know it) because I cannot be convinced. They say I hav seen enough to make me a Spiritualist. Well, if so, I am either a fool or not honest (I think both). But the facts are, the question is too great to jump at conclusions. And now I will side with Longshore and admit that we know not of the great law of psychology that may govern all the phenomena called Spiritualism. Allow me to state a fact that I fail to understand. In the fall of 1880 I was traveling with a son eighteen years old. We traveled by night, with horse and carriage. One night after "hitching up" my son said, "Pa, there is something going to happen to-night." I said, "Nothing more than common." "Yes," said he, "something more than common." In about two hours from that time he was bitten by a copperhead snake. His mother, two hundred miles away, waked up that night at 2 o'clock, and she says she knew there was trouble. In two days after, I received a letter from her asking what was the matter. My son is not superstitious, neither has he ever seen any ghosts or predicted trouble before or since. Where does either the psychological law or Spiritology come in? A. D. Swan.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"A Big Enough Family."

"I think there was chilens enough—
There was Kitty and Pomp and me;
A cat and a dog and a little boy
Are a big enough family.
We used to hav lots o' fun, you bet,
And now we hav none at all;
There's something upsta'rs in mamma's bed,
A little red thing in a shawl.

"If I slide down the bannisters,
Jes' make a little noise—
A woman comes out and pats my head,
And talks about 'good little boys.'
She wears a white apron and a cap,
And 'pears to own the house,
I wonner 'f she thinks a fellow like me
'S got fur on his feet, like a mouse?

"They're all the time talking about my nose
It's broke on the bridge, they say,
And they were certain sure there'd be
An accident there some day.
And when I look in the glass they laugh;
It's funny, I suppose.
But nobody ever did that before
When anything hurted my nose.

"When papa comes in, he says, 'Hullo,
You little rat—how's Sis?'
He means that wiggly thing upstairs
The cook calls 'Little Miss,'
That's got the puckers in her skin,
And squinties in her eyes,
And looks like a 'gyptian mummy,
'Specially when she cries.

"Her nose is ten times broker'n mine,
Don't look like a nose, a bit.
It's got little holes, but not any bone,
And mamma keeps pinching it.
Jack Wilder's got a brother now,
'At can walk and pitch a ball;
Why didn't they get a child like that
'Stead of that thing in a shawl?

"Anyhow I've got Pomp and Kit,
They know a lot for true,
They scoot when they see that woman come,
And that's zactly what I do.
She can't catch us, but when she says
That baby's the image o' me,
I wish that Pomp and Kit and I
Was all the family."

Jimmy.

Judge Cheney was passing down the street when close by his side he heard: "Mornin' Star, Times, and Herald one for a nickel, three for a dime! Paper, mister?" and the little ragged newspaper-vender held one before the judge.

"Yes, my little son," he answered, "I'll take one of each kind," and taking the papers and putting a quarter in his hand he started along.

"Wait, mister, you havn't got your change. The papers ain't only ten cents, and you've gin me twenty-five."

"That is all right, my good boy. I do not need the change, you are welcome to it."

"He called me his son and his good boy, nobody never did that afore," he said in an undertone.

Often the judge would be in town with his horse and carriage, and after this occurrence Jimmy (for this was the boy's name) always seemed to be around, and would step forward with a, "Hold your hoss, mister?" refusing to take any pay unless actually compelled to do so by the judge.

If walking the streets Jimmy would invariably follow him, and once in a heavy wind his hat blew off and Jimmy activly caught it and saved it from harm, refusing as usual to take pay for the act.

"Why do you do these things for me, my boy, and then refuse the money I offer you?"

"Oh, 'cause I want to."

"But why do you want to?"

"Oh, 'cause I do."

"But that's no reason."

"Yes it am," said Jimmy, running away shouting, "Star, Herald, Times, three for a dime!"

"Strange," mused the judge.

A few days after this, while hurrying along the street, he heard a shouting behind him, and a voice saying, "Wait a minute, mister; wait a minute," and turning he beheld Jimmy with his purse.

"I seen you drop it, sir. You didn't quite get it in your pocket, an' it dropped."

"Why did you not keep it, my son?"

"'Cause it's yourn."

"Because it was mine?"

"Yes, sir."

"Would you hav kept it if it had belonged to some other person?"

"I don't know, perhaps I might if I'd never seen you."

"But why should that make any difference?"

Jimmy was silent.

"Will you go home with me?"

"Yes, sir."

They talked but little on the way, but after they had reached the house and entered the library, the judge remarked: "I suppose you hav no idea of the amount of money in this purse."

"No, sir."

"Over a thousand dollars."

"By cricky! Beg your pardon—I mean, oh, my!"

"Now, do you not wish you had kept it?"

"No, sir; I wouldn't keep nothing of yourn if anybody would giv me the hull world, I mean unless you wanted me to hav it."

"Now, I want you should tell me why you follow me about and do so many favors for me for nothing."

"'Cause you allers look kind at me, and called me your son and your good boy, and nobody never did afore, and I've tried to be good ever since."

"Hav you no father, mother, or other relatives?"

"No, sir, not as I knows on. Granny Biggs kep' an' pounded me when I didn't beg a lot, till I runned away and wouldn't liv with her no more; then I sold papers."

"Would you like to liv with me any better?"

"What, liv right here and be your truly son?"

"Yes."

"And be dressed nice, and go to school and could I call you papa?"

"Certainly, and my wife will be your mamma."

"Oh, but maybe she wouldn't like me!"

"Yes, she will," said a pleasant voice in the doorway, and a beautiful lady glided into the room and kissed him, ragged and dirty as he was. Jimmy commenced to cry.

"Why, my son, what is the matter?" asked the judge.

"I'm so—so happy," he sighed.

"Now, this will not do. I will hav good Jacob giv you a bath while I go out and purchase you a suit of clothes. Here, I will measure you first. As soon as you are dressed we will hav dinner."

Jimmy did not look like the same boy after his bath, and the donning of his new suit, his pretty stockings and neat slippers, and his long tangled hair arranged in beautiful curls by his mamma. She then led him to a long pier glass to view himself. "My, I guess I'm somebody else!" he exclaimed.

"You are Jamie Cheney now," she replied, "our little son."

Jamie, as we will now call him, was very awkward at the table. He commenced to eat with his knife, then observing his papa and mamma, he blushed and used his fork instead. But the judge and his good wife soon put his mind at ease, and taught him the use of his napkin and other table manners. He is now a man, a kind and dutiful son, a good husband and proud father. Who among our rich will do what Judge Cheney did? SADIE ATHENA MAGOON.

A Letter from Alhaza.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: Cardinal Gibbons quotes St. Paul's remark, that God chooses the weak to confound the strong. I think I would not oppose the strong, if they conduct themselvs in a reasonable manner.

He also makes the assertion, that Christianity was established by the finger of God, and not by the might of kings. On the contrary, I think religion was propagated in the usual way, and no method omitted for this purpose that the craft of man could suggest.

Anything that could be made available—persuasion, intimidation—was resorted to to coerce the human mind into acceptance.

The most shameful and dishonorable appeals hav been addressed to that principle of credulity, which St. Jerome remarks is without limit.

Force was often used, and a fiendish cruelty which exposes not so much the barbarity of man as it does the terrible instincts of the brute revived by the fire of fanaticism. The might of kings! When we know so well how Constantine employed his power in this connection, even offering rewards to obtain converts. Charlemagne closed every victory by either baptizing the defeated party, or having their heads separated from their bodies.

New religions were grafted upon the old by missionaries—for Isis and her son Horus were substituted the Virgin Mary and Christ.

But, my friends, I feel sad to-day. My little cat, "Bessie," is dead. She was charming and intelligent. She came galloping in at breakfast time, pressing the latch of a door down with her paw. She brought in sparrows, and mewed until I pretended to eat one. She never caught mice, but spent much time in the cultivation of her voice.

Her paw had a graceful fold
Which envious cats hav tried in vain;
Her lovely voice, oh, it were bliss
To hear her purring once again.
And in the hue of her dear coat
There was a softer tinge of blue
Than since old Eve's Grimalkin mewed
Hath tinged a mortal pussie's flue.*

Correspondence.

SAN JACINTO, CAL., Feb. 17, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Children's Corner and see if they would be accepted. I am twelve years old. I go to school and study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, geography, grammar, and music. We hav five sheep, nineteen head of horses, and about twenty-five head of cattle. I wish some of the girls about my own age would write me a letter. The next time I write I will tell something about California. I will close. So good-bye.

Your friend, LUCINDA C. CLARK.

BRUCE, S. D., Feb. 25, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Having never written to the Corner, I thought I would let you hear from South Dakota.

We hav had such a nice winter here, almost summer weather part of the time, until this month we hav had some cold weather. My father has taken this paper for two years, and could not get along without it. We are talking of having a Liberal society here the coming summer, and I am going to send for a "Cosmian Hymn Book," so as to hav singing at our Liberal meetings.

I am fifteen years old; am attending school, and am going to college this summer. My brother started this week. If you start a young people's paper, I will subscribe for it.

Your Freethinker friend,
MAUD CARPENTER.

ACME, WASH., Feb. 11, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: I am a little girl only seven years old. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a number of years, and I read the Children's Corner. I like it very well. This will be the first letter to the Corner that I hav ever written. I hav one of your books; it is the "Story Hour." I hav another book which has about all fairy tales in it. I never like those untrue stories. I am a Freethinker, and I guess I shall always stay one. Papa and I came out here to get land, and papa took up a claim in Baker valley. At school I study reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, and spelling. There was a young man who is a Liberal, and he taught school, and he put me in those high studies, and I am getting along nicely. My mother died five years ago, and papa and I were left alone. I guess my letter is getting tiresome, so I will close.

Your Liberal friend, LORA R. FLICK.

[A remarkably good letter for a child of seven years.—ED. C. C.]

BYRON, MINN., Feb. 24, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Dear Madam, and Sister in Truth: In the issue of this paper of February 21st I notice comments of yourself, and our esteemed friend, Geo. J. Remsburg, in reference to a child's or young people's Liberal paper. Now, this idea strikes me so forcibly that I beg to offer, in my feeble way, my suggestions. Now, Liberals, let us see what can be done. How many will pledge their support? I here offer and pledge $5 to be paid on demand. Now, if we can just get our friends interested we can soon hav the project under way. If a paper of the kind be started, would it not be a good idea to hav Heston furnish suitable cartoons, as they would interest the children, and are the best means to educate them, as a child never forgets an object-lesson.

For fear of tiring you and your readers, I will close, with the hope of seeing this project discussed by abler pens than mine, and that you will get the support you so much deserve, and hav won by your earnestness and zeal in behalf of the noblest cause woman can engage in, emancipating humanity from the curse of superstition.

Fraternally yours,
WALTER A. JOHNSON.

MILTON, Feb. 14, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I am going to write to the Children's Corner to-day. I think some of those letters that are written in the Corner are real nice. And the recitation-pieces, they are fine also. I hav memorized some of them, and some of the people that I recite to think they are very good. Some pieces are so laughable, and others are so melancholy. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and has been taking it for several years. And I like it real well. It is too bad that England has lost its great and good Bradlaugh. I am of the opinion that England has lost its greatest and grandest man. It is as though America had lost her immortal Ingersoll. I hav memorized a piece entitled, "Heaven Below." That is the kind of heaven we want, right here and now. My shoes are getting a little the worse for wear, and I think if I were asked which I would take, the Bible, heaven, or a new pair of shoes, I would take the latter. Wishing you ever so much success in your good work, I remain,

Your little friend, MAUD V. HAIGHT.

[A sensible girl is Maud.—ED. C. C.]

CISNE, ILL., Feb. 15, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it is the preacher's day to make his bread and butter, and it is raining too much to entertain myself out of doors, I thought I would write to the Corner. I liv with my stepfather. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, has the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and mother has the book, "Men, Women, and Gods."

I read the Corner. I like very much to see so many names of young people who are brave enough to speak or write these sentiments. As for me, I can't exactly say what I am. I can hardly say I am an Infidel. I rather believe I am an Atheist.

I am in my twentieth year, and am not like most boys of Christian parentage who think the first step toward manhood is a chew of tobacco, big swear-words, a dram of liquor, or joining the church. Of all these I hav done neither. I do right because it is right, and not because I am afraid of going to eternal hell if I don't. One day at Sunday-school the superintendent made a glove on the blackboard; on the wrist he put, "I don't," and on the fingers, "chew, smoke, drink, or swear," and then asked who could put it on to hold up their hands. They looked amazed to see two Freethinkers hold up their hands. They were my brother and I myself, and their church-members could not. It is hard, but they knew it was so. As this is my first letter, I will close.

Yours respectfully, ELMER W. PRIDE.

CORYDON, PA., Feb. 20, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written a letter to the Children's Corner, but as I am a Liberal I think it is time I do.

Where I liv the people are mostly "Christians," but papa, mamma, and all of my near relativs are Liberals. I am glad of this, for I do not desire to hav any relativs who are "Christians."

I attend school here. I am in the highest room, and in some of the highest classes. Our teacher is a young man, and he would be a very good person to learn from if he would spend all of his time on his school; but he does not. He is studying to be a minister, and of course he is thinking more about this than he does about his school work. He has preached several times in our church here. He is a great hand for religious exercises in his school, and spends altogether too much time every morning reading the "holy book," repeating the Lord's Prayer, and singing hymns. I don't think this is right; he is not hired to preach and pray for us. Then, all this takes time that we ought to be using on our studies.

I hav no sisters, but hav one brother eight years old. He is very bright, and learns so easily—reads well in the Third Reader. There is nothing he enjoys so well as to hav some one read to him—not childish stories, but any kind of reading that entertains grown people, such as tales of adventure, lives of great men, and anything of interest.

I am taking piano lessons from a lady friend of mine here, and I try very hard to understand music and play well.

I am living with an aunt of mine here, so that I can go to school, as there is none in the place where I liv. Auntie has such a dear little girl, two years old, named Camilla, and she has a Mother Goose book and can repeat almost every rhyme in it. She thinks she is reading them, but she is just saying them from memory. She has a figure made to look like Santa Claus, which she likes better than any doll, and she thinks she cannot go to bed unless she takes it with her.

My cousin Fanny Morrison livs at Sugar Run, and I like to go down to see her. I go down often on Saturday and stay over Sunday, and Fanny and I hav a good time while I am there. We study and read together and play duets on the piano.

I hav an aunt living in Brooklyn, and she sends me St. Nicholas and Life, and I spend many pleasant evenings reading them. I like to read the Youth's Companion too.

I am happy to hav the spring come; then I can go to the hills and gather the beautiful trailing arbutus and the cunning little lichen. When I am on the hills I am always happy.

I hope I shall see this in the Corner. If so, I will write again some day.

Your little Liberal friend,
FLORENCE B. AIKEN.

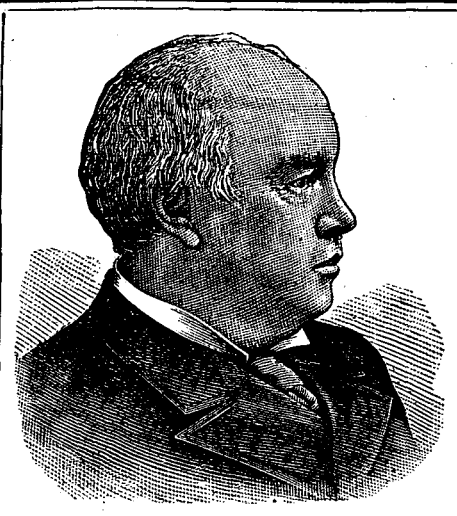
What People Say of Our Books.

J. H. Cook writes of William Hart's book, "The Candle From Under the Bushel:" "Some one has very kindly sent me three copies of the above book, which I hav read with great mental gusto and frequent hearty laughs at the author's witty comparisons, incongruities, contradictions, ludicrous deductions, and absurdities, of which the holy Bible is so prolific. Surely the author is an acute critic, a keen and discriminating logician. The book shows great study and research, and is a most thorough analysis, dissection, and comparison of different books and passages of the 'inspired word.' Its style reminds me of D. M. Bennett's 'Interrogatories to Jehovah.' Would that 'The Candle From Under the Bushel' could be read by and illuminate all Goodites and priest-ridden bibliologists. Reader, however wise you may be, if you are able, buy and read, and circulate this very valuable and important addition to Freethought and human literature."

LIBERTY IN LITERATURE, a Testimonial to Walt Whitman, by Robert G Ingersoll. An address delivered in Philadelphia, Oct. 21, 1890.



This address of Colonel Ingersoll is a grand defense of the right of liberty of utterance. Its eulogy of Whitman is a tribute to all the men and women who hav struggled for "liberty in literature." Walt Whitman is not, according to our idea, the American poet. He is only a prophecy. The song of liberty must be free from dirt. Colonel Ingersoll has made the most of what there is in Whitman, and has again shown in this "testimonial" his ardent love of freedom and his wonderful power of expression. The volume contains a portrait of the "good gray poet." It contains 77 pages and is handsomely bound and printed. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.—Boston Investigator.

The Truth Seeker Company has laid upon the Gaze teer table a copy of Robert G Ingersoll's testimonial to Walt Whitman, entitled "Liberty in Literature." This is an address delivered by the colonel in Philadelphia, last October, at a reception tendered the venerable poet, and which was extensivly published in the newspaper press, but in a somewhat mutilated form. As it appears in the little book before us it has been carefully revised by the author. The cover is ornamented by a good picture of Mr. Ingersoll, and the likeness of the author of "Leaves of Grass" is given as a frontispiece. It is a handsome little book with a neat cover, and is well printed on heavy paper. The price is only 25 cents. "If I were to edit the great books of the world," says Ingersoll, "I might leave out some lines, and I might leave out the best. I hav no right to make of my brain a sieve and say that only that which passes through belongs to the rest of the human race. I claim the right to choose. I giv that right to all."—Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Tex.

The address delivered by Col. Robert G Ingersoll at the testimonial celebration in honor of Walt Whitman, which took place in Philadelphia last October, has been reprinted in a neat volume under the title, "Liberty in Literature." The orator was happily chosen for the occasion, and his tribute to Whitman eloquently sets forth the various aspects of the poet's genius as the interpreter of modern democracy, and as the prophet of the identity of spirit and matter in man and of the equal sacredness of both. In concluding his oration Colonel Ingersoll says: "As you read the marvelous book, or the person, called 'Leaves of Grass,' you feel the freedom of the antique world, you hear the voices of the morning, of the first great singers—voices elemental as those of sea and storm. The horizon enlarges, the heavens grow ample, limitations are forgotten—the realization of the will, the accomplishment of the ideal, seem to be within your power. . . . A feeling of independence takes possession of the soul, the body expands, the blood flows full and free, superiors vanish, flattery is a lost art, and life becomes rich, royal, and superb. The world becomes a personal possession, and the oceans, the continents and constellations belong to you. You are in the center, everything radiates from you, and in your veins beats and throbs the pulse of all life. . . . In this one book, in these wondrous 'Leaves of Grass,' you find hints and suggestions, touches and fragments, of all there is of life that lies between the babe, whose rounded cheeks dimple beneath his mother's laughing, loving eyes, and the old man, snow-crowned, who, with a smile, extends his hand to death."—Home Journal.

"The Origin of the Christian Bible." By O. B. Whitford. M D. The author shows that the Bible had a Hindoo origin, and that the Hebrew stories and legends belong to the family of myths that owe their existence to the superstitions of the East. This pamphlet contains a great many valuable quotations and references and shows considerable research and study. Truth Seeker Co., New York.—Boston Investigator.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Fordyce Barker, M D, Professor Bellevue Medical College, N. Y, says: 'I regard your book, 'How to Preserve Health,' as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I have ever met. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family and in the library of every school, for I think it would popularize a vast amount of important and useful knowledge, and thus be of great service to the community. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it; that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging, which our anxious grandmothers and others lacking the requisite elementary knowledge are too prone to indulge in, and oftentimes do great harm thereby. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

John B. Hamilton, M.D, Surgeon General of the Navy, and Professor of Surgery, Georgetown University: "I thank you for the excellent book, 'How to Preserve Health.' I have no doubt of the necessity of such books, and yours is of such merit that it will surely be successful."

Samuel Sherwell, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Skin, Brooklyn: "Your excellent treatise, entitled 'How to Preserve Health,' appears to me admirably adapted for the reading of the laity, correcting as it does a large number of false impressions that prevail among them The direct suggestions, as in remarks on the skin, are of decided value."

It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you have used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address the doctor at Vineland, N. J, and say where you saw this advertisment.

News of the Week.

THE chief of police of Hoboken, N. J., has forbidden improper theatrical posters. Captain Hayes has been made the official censor of posters. The managers of Cronheim's and Jacobs's theaters hav been notified that all posters must be submitted to him before they are given to the bill poster.

ENGLAND has had a blizzard in which 115 lives were lost.

DR. WINDTHORST, Catholic leader in the German parliament, died on the 14th.

CLERGYMEN and others in Hoboken, N. J., hav sent the police a protest against Sunday theaters.

AT Pittsburgh the Junior Order of American mechanics hav protested against display of the Irish flag on St. Patrick's day.

SIX Madrid physicians appointed to investigate Koch's remedy report that it has not made one cure, and should be suspended.

REV. FATHER GRATON, Catholic priest of Manitoba, in his eagerness to be at the polls and work election day, got caught in a storm and frozen to death.

THROUGHOUT Lehigh county, Pa., the Evangelical churches are convulsed over the "Bowmanite quarrel." Several church buildings are locked and defended by one faction against another, and police hav been required.

THE Russian press censorship has authorized the publication of the new Russian translation of the Koran without excising the passages previously supposed to disparage the Russian orthodox religion.

THE Catholic religious orders will each build a college at Washington auxiliary to the great Catholic University, making our capital a hot bed of ecclesiasticism.

THE Catholic League of the People, founded in Germany to oppose Socialism, has just held its first general meeting at Cologne, the archbishop of Cologne presiding.

LORD MAYOR SAVORY of London lately delivered a pious address which is shown to hav been stolen from one of Spurgeon's sermons. Of his efforts to lie out of it the Pall Mall Gazette says that they hav an odious flavor of sanctimonious humbug.

CATHOLICS continue to cry against "the Holy Father being compelled to submit to a government which has robbed the church, oppressed the people beyond the power of endurance, and which has not been backward in availing itself of every opportunity to insult and vilify his Holiness."

THE cremation of the remains of Emma Abbott has drawn fresh invectivs from Christian anti-cremationists, the chief Catholic organ in America saying: "The modern crematory is an insult to Christianity. Its inventors intended it as an hourly argument against the doctrin of resurrection, and the blasphemers so use it."

To Indian Commissioner Morgan's statements that to avoid hostility from the Catholic church he has tolerated incompetent teachers belonging to it, Catholics indignantly exclaim that "Thomas J. Morgan is the first commissioner of Indian affairs who ever discovered that the sisters and fathers in charge are unworthy and incompetent persons."

THE Christian girl, Esther Solymosi, who disappeared in Hungary nine years ago just before a Jewish Passover, is thought to hav been found living in New York. It was said that Jews had offered her as a sacrifice, according to the custom which Christians accuse them of. Eight Jews were charged with murder and confined in dungeons fifteen months before trial and acquittal.

IN the forenoon of Saturday, the 14th, five thousand citizens of New Orleans, headed by lawyers, merchants, and other leading citizens, broke open the jail and killed eleven of the Italians whom the jury had failed to convict of murdering Chief of Police Hennessy. Most of the local papers approve. The jurymen are ostracised. Several of the Italian vessels in our ports on hearing the news put their flags at half-mast. The Italian consul has protested. Blaine has communicated to the governor of Louisiana the president's disapproval, saying that among the killed were three or more Italian subjects, whom our treaty guarantees security of person and property.

Gems of Thought.

ALL the phenomena of witchcraft are now believed by scientists to be the products of natural laws. If they are right, is not God proved guilty of ignorance when he gave the edict, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," and was it not a wicked ignorance which through this command has caused such countless murders and persecutions? Dr. Sprenger, in his "Life of Mohammed," estimates that nine million people hav been put to death as witches during the Christian era. Blackstone said that to deny witchcraft was to deny revelation. How can the inspiration of this law stand the light of the present day?—Robert C. Adams.

TRUTH must be investigated without any side glance to the consequences which that investigation may hav upon our hopes.—Greg.

THE discovery of what is true and the practice of that which is good are the two most important objects of philosophy.—Voltaire.

LET us look on as calmly as may be at the huge turmoil of conflicting controversy; smile with equal calmness at the bigots, who would damn people for losing their way in the dark; at the pompous dogmatists who would face it out that they can see as clearly in the dark as in broad daylight; at the feather-headed enthusiasts who take the first will-o'-the-wisp for a safe guide, and patch up a new religion out of scraps and tatters of half-understood science.—Leslie Stephen.

THE individual does the right thing out of regard for his own good, his own advantage, his own fair fame, and his social position, or having the fear of the law and of punishment before his eyes. The better ordained and regulated the social order in which the individual livs, the keener will be his own desire to lead a virtuous and moral life. To this may be added the moral instinct or the spontaneous disposition toward a moral behavior, a sort of moral organization which each individual receives from those parents and ancestors who hav lived for long ages in more or less orderly social or political conditions. If to all this be added the powerful influence of education, habit, and example, we are in possession of all that is necessary for moral behavior, without being obliged to hav recourse either to an innate moral law or to the means of grace or the hope of glory held out by the church or religion. This being so, what is the good of those everlasting hypocritical confessions of faith and professions of religious dogmas, which are opposed to reason, and neither required by, nor conduciv to, virtue and morality?—Buchner.

THE educated man is his own priest, his own pope, his own church.—Ingersoll.

THE civilized man is distinguished from the uncivilized in this: that while the latter is content when he has obtained food enough to satisfy his immediate wants, the former looks ahead and makes provision for months or even years. "Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal" (Matt. vi, 19). With banks, insurance companies, and provident societies by the score in our midst, how is it possible for Christians to say they practice the above teaching?—Arthur B. Moss.

THE obligation of natural affection counted as nothing compared with the duty of theological conformity.—Felix L. Oswald in the Bible of Nature.

I CHANT the chant of dilation or pride,
We hav had ducking and deprecating about enough. —Walt Whitman.

THE fathers, in asserting that the books were inspired, were guided not by critical ability, but by ignorance and superstition. Instead of being great scholars, they were extremely credulous, and in general very inferior intellectually. After much controversy, it became apparent that they could not agree as to what books should form the Bible; and councils took the matter in hand, and for nearly twelve centuries they discussed it. And finally, the Roman Catholic church in the council of Trent, and the Greek church in the council of Constantinople, decided once for all what the list should be for their adherents; and the Westminster assembly gave the English-speaking Protestants their catalog.—Keeler's Short History of the Bible.

HOW THE CHURCH WAS FORCED TO QUIT MURDERING.

Notes and Clippings.

In Belgium one out of every two hundred of the population is a monastic brother. These thirty-two thousand monks, notwithstanding their vow of poverty, hav property valued at $26,000,000. In France there are fully ten thousand Sisters of Mercy, who upon entering the eight hundred cloisters of that country, resign all claims to their property. Yet the property of these orders is worth more than $5,000,000.

If this country is to be maintained as a free country, says the Ironclad Age, the Infidels must maintain it. Infidels originally made it free, and its keeping is in their hands. It takes liberal men to maintain a republican form of government, because they are tolerant, just, and hate tyranny and oppression. Bigotry and proscription are tyrannical. Intolerance is the weapon of potentates and priests. It yields nothing for the common good. The Infidel cheerfully concedes to others the rights he claims for himself. He is mindful and watchful of the rights of all. He is not clannish and narrow, but broad and general in his views. His thoughts grasp the whole community of national interests. He can lift himself above personal considerations. He can excuse the ignorant prejudice that proscribes him, and still be just to his persecutors even. The Infidel alone is capable of perpetuating a system of government in which the rights of all men are sacredly observed.

Prince Napoleon, whose death occurred last week in Rome, was a Freethinker. Of the clerical ghouls who hovered around his deathbed the Times says: "The denunciation by the Paris correspondent of the London Times of the unseemly and revolting conduct of some of those present in the last hours of Prince Napoleon is as deserved as it is unqualified: 'Public opinion is revolted by the hideous zeal of those who tortured the dying in order to make them clients of the confessional; it is revolted still more by the rebel son who persists in rebellion in order to secure ephemeral and useless power. The confessors, cardinals, nuns, and other religious persons hav shown a willingness to revive all the horrors of the Middle Ages. The only one who leaves the horrible scene with a higher reputation is the prince himself, who preserved intact his force of will to die as he had lived, with a horror of counterfeit in his soul and with contempt for hypocrits on his lips.'"

A bill has been presented in the Danish Folkething, or lower house, providing that laymen may be permitted to speak at interments. It is claimed by its advocates, who belong exclusivly to the party of the Left, that this measure, if passed, would relieve clergymen of much embarrassment in the case of the burials of Infidels and non-churchgoers. It seems at present very improbable that the bill will be passed, as it is strongly opposed by the government party. The whole question hinges upon the relation of the churchyards to the church and the commune respectivly, and the ecclesiastical authorities are not likely to allow such a concession to be made if they can help it. There is in Denmark, as in England, a powerful movement in the direction of disestablishment, and any change that can be construed as favoring this radical movement is viewed with suspicion by the powers that be. From the American standpoint, the present demand would seem eminently fair and desirable, even from the point of view of the clergy. But in Denmark politics and religion are so closely connected that no question can be considered from a non-partisan side.—Independent.

A brass band stood at the grave of Dr. Shoettly at Egerton, O, a few weeks ago, and played a variety of lively tunes as the clods fell on the coffin of the dead physician. It was in accordance with his expressed wish. His dying injunction was that there be no mourning or appearance of mourning on the occasion of his funeral. He made a provision for the payment of $25 from his estate to the band should the leader carry out his instructions to the letter. The leader did so and got his money. The doctor was an Infidel and sought in this way to show his contempt for all religion. He directed that there should be neither singing nor praying nor any form of religious ceremony at his grave. His request in this regard was also complied with. His neighbors were shocked beyond expression at the funeral, but none more so than his wife, who was a devout Catholic. Mrs. Shoettly, who was a hopeless invalid and knew that she must soon die, was overcome with grief at the manner of her husband's burial, but as she loved him devotedly she determined that she must be buried by his side. It is said that a letter was written to Rome asking what should be done in the case, and that an answer was received that in view of the sacrilege at the physician's funeral, if the wife was laid by the husband's side the ceremonies of the church must be omitted. For a long time the woman's desire to lie beside her husband struggled with her religious feeling, but love for her husband finally conquered. A few days ago she died and was taken to the cemetery without ceremony, followed only by a few of her late husband's friends.

Labouchere, the noted editor of London Truth, writes: "Mr. Bradlaugh was a man of herculean physical strength, but of great nervous susceptibility. I believe that he never entirely recovered from the rough usage which he met with when he sought to force his way into the House of Commons. . . . Never was a man less understood. I never knew anyone with a stronger sense of public decorum or with a deeper respect for law. Mr. Bradlaugh was my colleague for ten years. During all these years our relations, political and personal, were always of the most cordial character. He was, in private life, a thoroughly true and amiable man, while in public life he was ever ready to sacrifice popularity to his convictions of what was right. He was, as is known, an Atheist, but his standard of duty was a very high one, and he lived up to it. His life was an example to Christians, for he abounded in every Christian virtue. This the House of Commons came at last to recognize. I do not think that there is a single member more popular or more respected than he was on both sides. Often and often Conservativs hav, in a friendly way, said to me: 'What a much better man your colleague is than you are.' And I entirely agreed with them."

Atheists Before the Court.

Scant justice would Atheists giv us if they were not restrained by public opinion created by religious sentiment (Rev. Robert Court, D.D., of Chicago, Sunday-school lesson in the Lowell, Mass., Weekly Journal, 1890).

If Atheists hav not always given religionists such justice as they might desire, it is largely because the insolent pretenders to piety hav first set the force example, the example of injuring those of adverse opinion. Indeed, justice exeeuted to Christians, according to their code, the lex talionis, "such measure as ye mete shall be measured unto you again," is the last thing they think of. Nay, they cannot endure the thought, but console their bankrupt consciences with the forged receipt, "Jesus paid it all."

Jesus died and paid it all—
All but a dollar and a quarter;
Yet sin had left a crimson stain,
And they scrubbed it out with water.
(Revised Hymn).

Bruno, Campanella, Kepler, Vanini, Galilei, Copernicus, Descartes, and Spinoza had to force their way through a snapping and howling pack of monkish fanatics who beset the path of every reformer, and overcame the heroism of all but the stoutest champions of light and freedom. From the tenth to the end of the sixteenth century not less than three million "heretics," i.e., scholars and free inquirers, had to expiate their love of truth in the flames of the stake (Prof. Felix L. Oswald in The Bible of Nature).

The wholesale charge made by the Theists, or Godites, of every stripe, against Atheists, of their being without moral principle, coupled with the common habit of ascribing Atheism to whomsoever holds other views than their own, is in itself the worst injustice the world ever knew, the most infamous judgment that wickedness can devise, it being the dogmatic basis of tyranny and torture, ostracism and oppression, hate, death, hell and damnation, which the ignorant and iniquitous, superstitious, selfish, and sensual pious in power hav always brought upon whomsoever they would, so far as they could, further coolly stultifying themselvs with the self-righteous sentiment that God in his goodness, Brahma in his bliss, Jupiter in his justice, or Jehovah in his jealousy created and suffered the ungodly to liv on purpose to amuse himself and minister to his saints or furnish them subjects for that climacteric act of Christian and other faith—the holy barbecue of live heretics.

Aud if the sectarian cannot brand and burn others as formerly when he was in power, he makes the most of his liberty to belie them that his income may abound. This milder method may be even more potent than the fiery ordeal in that it is not so furiously resisted. Says Edwin Marlitt:

Blasphemy, Infidelity, scoffer—the influence of these favorit denunciatory words of your party is not to be underrated. Principally by their means a large number of intelligent beings, incredible as the statement is in the nineteenth century, are in apparent subjection to a minority of narrow-minded fanatics. Many men of intellect hav a certain faith in the influence of these worn-out anathemas upon the masses, and are silent in spite of their more enlightened convictions, and this givs the throne upon which your party is seated feet of clay for a certain season (Little Moorland Princess).

Moral sentiment did not evolute from a theological seminary. Chastity will not die with the clergy. Good will outliv God.

Why is anyone an Atheist, and why is Atheism ever avowed, when it has exercised against it the odds of public opinion, popular legislation, and autocratic ukase, unless it is because the Atheist is a person of original convictions and has honesty and courage enough to declare them?

The Atheist's faith will never shrink
Though pressed by pious foe,
He will not tremble on the brink
Of threatened God-damned woe.
(Gospel Hymn Revised).

Who are these terrible Atheists, and what hav they done to call forth the sweeping sentence of the Christian Court? We will first let one answer who is most frequently cited as an example of godless impiety by the volatil victims of Atheophobia, Voltaire, the inspirer of liberty in France, but who yet was not an Atheist, but a Deist, as were also Moses and Mohammed, Solomon and Socrates, Jesus and Josephus, Thomas Paine and Theodore Parker:

Why is a society of Atheists thought impossible? Because it is thought that men under no restraint (fear) could never liv together; that laws avail nothing against secret crimes; and that there must be an avenging God, punishing in this world, or another, those delinquents who hav escaped human justice. But among the gentiles, several sects had no such curb; they were persuaded that the soul is not a substance, but a faculty of the body; and consequently their only check was morality and honor. The Roman senators and knights, in Cicero's time, were downright Atheists; as "neither to fear nor to expect anything from the gods, amounts to a denial of their existence." There is, in Atheism, no temptation to those sanguinary procedures for which fanaticism is notorious. Atheists, for the most part, are men of study (Voltaire).

Thus is stoutly set aside the olden fib, "The fool hath saith in his heart there is no God." If the devout readers dispute the famous French Cyclopedist we cite yet again the opinion of one they are fond of quoting as a champion Christian philosopher, the author of the "Novum Organum." If he is not accepted as an authority on the subject his logic nevertheless remains and needs no strengthening:

Atheism leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all of which may be guides to practical and moral virtue, though religion were not. But superstition dismounts all these and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men. Therefore Atheism did never perturb states, for it makes men prudent and content, as limiting their views to this life, and we see the times inclined to Atheism were civil times. But superstition hath been the confusion of many states, and bringeth in many a primum mobile [first mover, as a mainspring] that ravishes all the spheres of government (Lord Bacon).

Thus the great Bacon with one bold sweep of his pen demolishes the blatant defamation of Atheism, and impeaches the meek pretense of that mock piety which is childish toward God and cruel toward men.

Christianity has always opposed every forward movement of the human race. Across the highway of progress it has always been building breastworks of Bibles, tracts, commentaries, prayer-books, creeds, dogmas, and platforms, and at every advance the Christians hav gathered together behind these heaps of rubbish and shot the poisoned arrows of malice at the soldiers of freedom (Robert Ingersoll).

Atheists hav been the leaders of the people's progress ever since "fear hurled the God an engin on the world" to crush inquiry beneath its idolatrous wheels, for whatever invention in art, science, or philosophy, or attempt at reform in religion, has been made for the benefit of man, the priests and their panderers hav cried out, "Impiety!" "Blasphemy!" "Atheism!" "Crucify him!" "Damn him!" It would take too long a time to recite the countless instances of religious injustice, for the history of the world is the record of religious wrong, as may be read in brief in Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man."

Every concession of the rights of the people made by power assuming to be ordained by God, has been wrung from them by those whom they would like to roast and damn as Atheists, because the very claim that anything can be made better than the creator left it is a tacit denial of God's jurisdiction.

Once, to be an Atheist was to be an outlaw; now, to be an Atheist is to be a knight of order.

Atheism is the gospel of happiness. It is the herald of good news—that this wondrously beautiful world is not under the wrath of any monster in the skies. Christianity stamps upon the human heart the counterfeiting die of a devil, and seeks to save sinners from a horrid hell by a bribe of a blissful heaven. Atheism grasps all the good it can hold, seeks truth for its own sweet sake, strives to scatter the sunshine about the hearthstones of happy homes, and teaches men to lead noble lives, that they may leave the world better than they found it. Christianity seeks to save souls from pits of its own digging, to sever the shadowy shackles itself has forged from the fog of mystical faiths. Atheism comes to wrench from the world the frightful veil with which creeds and churches hav wrapped the fair face of nature, to giv us a glimpse of the peace of an earthly paradise, and to teach us to stand fast in that liberty wherewith our natures make us free; to usher in the glorious gospel of gladness until the doleful discord of religions hav sighed out their last sad notes on the dying breeze of evening, and the blessed breath of the beautiful morning shall bring the cheerful chorus of hope and joy and justice from the gladsome lips of emancipated men (S. H. Preston).

All the good that Atheists, Infidels, skeptics, and heretics hav done, all the harm they hav left undone, declares the Christian Court and echoes the doting crowd, is due to the influence of religion of some sort, and mainly to Christianity. Say, rather, that whatever of good the religious hav done, what evil they hav thought to shun, Christians especially, should be credited to the natural humanity of mankind, and the impulse and teachings of dissenters to creeds, of whom Atheists are chief.

The boastful assassins of our two presidents were under religious influences, and so, too, were the crucifiers of Christ, the slaughterers of Socrates, the hackers of Hypatia, the executers of Robert Emmett, and the burners of Bruno.

Rev. Wm. S. Sloan, in an article in the Golden Rule (Christian Endeavor organ), says:

A very useful book to read is the life of one of the greatest of our race, the "Memoirs of Socrates" by Xenophon, with the companion records by Plato in his "Apology of Socrates," and his "Phædo," all of them to be obtained in excellent English translations. These books would almost suffice to educate a man. Certainly they are beautiful pictures of the best men by the best writers of that far-off time. The reading of the "Apology of Socrates" is very stimulating.

How much of the "Memoirs," "Apology," and "Phædo" of Socrates, was due to the influence of the Christian religion? Or were his wisdom and integrity, and the admiration and brilliancy of his biographers, inspired by the pagan religion (of which Paul said the Athenians had too much), for denying and ridiculing which in his academy he was, by a contemptible court of hypocrits, doomed to drink the deadly hemlock?

But after all, at this late day of protestation against theological tyranny and ignorant bigotry, Atheists and skeptics hav themselvs largely to blame, inasmuch as they deny their own dignity and cringe beneath the shadow of the dessicated skeleton of ecclesiasticism which hisses through rattling teeth and warping jaws its jealous taboo of Freethought. I hav good backing in Mr. E. Belfort Bax:

No matter what a man's belief or absence of belief may be, you may be quite sure in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he will profess to hav conscientious scruples as to calling himself an Atheist. The reason of this is not far to seek. The question of God or no God has very little to do with it. When the popular theory of the mounted policeman up above is discarded, all that remains is a highly subtle philosophical problem which it would be the rankest humbug in any ordinary man to pretend he felt the smallest interest in or even understood. The real point in the "not-an-Atheist" cant lies in the fact that the word Atheism is supposed in the popular mind to imply the rejection of the current bourgeois morality, the avowed sanctions of which rest on the abnormally developed policeman theory. It is bourgeois sentiment which is the well-spring of objection to the word Atheism, and not suddenly evoked scruples on refined points of metaphysic. (Our 'Agnostics' hav, to suit their own convenience, chosen to giv the word Atheism an altogether new and non-natural signification. Until recently it has simply meant, both in its etymology and usage, a non-believer in God. A highly respectable "Agnostic" of to-day, who accepts this latter position, in order to avoid calling himself an Atheist, has ingeniously twisted the word Atheism into meaning exclusivly the attempt to prove dogmatically the non-existence of a deity. Armed with this brand-new definition of Atheism, he is able to pass in middle-class circles as a highly creditable person, who is "not an Atheist—oh, dear, no!") (Ethics of Socialism).

The futility of this effort of the non-religious to escape the opprobrium of the Godiferous by the use of the fig-leaf of Agnosticism is apparent, in that they are called Atheists all the same, as they are in practice if not in name. Says one:

Now, I hold that the moment the idea that God ever was or is a partial God enters the soul, that moment doubt in him, in some form or other, enters the mind and heart and he ceases to influence the moral character of man. And is not this why all partial religious teaching leads to and is responsible for largely the Atheism and Infidelity of the world? Ingersoll, Mill, and the Infidel Pentecost were partialists originally. They tried to progress without recognizing the fundamental truth, "the universal fatherhood." They landed in the belief of universal orphanage (Rev. E. W. Jenkins's sermon at Connecticut Universalist convention, 1889).

Until Universalists and other "liberal Christians" quit calling their betters "Infidels," they should bottle their boasted "brotherhood of man" business. The God idea even in them, as ever, is a divider of the race; and if the "partialists" hav helped drive our greatest men to progress, blessed be partialism for that.

Who or what is this God or great what-you-may-call-it, that doubt, ignorance, or denial thereof is accounted infamous? Let certain of their own poets and professors answer.

Being whom we call God and know no more (Derzhavin).

Then why need we care?

God is a word used to express not our ideas but the want of them (John Stuart Mill).

Mill has come out of the mill all right and is in the college curriculum.

The infinit is not an object of human thought at all. . . . Attributes of mind must be conceived as existing in a person, and the existence of an infinit person is inconceivable (Mansel, Limits of Religious Thought).

Any less than an infinit would be a cur-tailed God.

Man's talk about the infinit is a mass of barren, vague, and meaningless abstractions, in which they baffle about nothing (Hooker).

What has no outline can hav no dimension. A point is infinit and is but a mathematical departure.

As a transcendental is an unconditioned being, God cannot be scientifically known (Sir William Hamilton).

That which is known at all is scientifically known. The transcendental is contemptible. The unconditioned lacks the condition of existence.

God will only punish men for wickedness, and not for holding opinions. That is the truth which cuts into the knot of sophistry and ends that great error, that error itself is guilt. The church should be more intolerant of selfishness, cant, and hypocrisy, and less indignant with original opinions. The minister should be the pattern of intolerance of all that is immoral, and the model of tolerance of what is honest doubt and honest belief in what differs from himself (Rev. Phillips Brooks, Trinity church, Boston).

That is an advance of the Christian standard to which the rank and file of superstition, as it is in Jesus, will never come up. Their war-song is:

Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the lamb,
And shall I liv in love and peace
With those whom God doth damn?

No, I must fight as well as pray,
Giv me a gun, O God!
The Atheists hav got no rights,
We'll blot them off the sod.
(Watts, altered).

But the Atheists will not get from the earth for all the gospel gunning. There are others that might better be spared from the "footstool," as says the Rev. Mr. Greene, pastor of the Shattuck street Universalist church, Lowell, Mass. "To sit down in the dirt and wait for God to clean up is worse than Atheism." Says Parker Pillsbury, the venerable Abolitionist and Spiritualist:

Not Frederick the Great alone, but every brave captain, practically believes that God is ever on the side of the heaviest and best-handled battalions. In any desperate engagement the church herself would trust the best general, though an open Atheist, sooner than her devoutest saint, if a coward or a fool, though he should fast forty days and pray forty nights before every battle (Popular Religions, Concord, N. H., 1891).

Peaceable people could get along better without any such gunner of a God. As to the Atheist as a champion of righteousness, the Seventh Day Adventists hav nominated one, so-called, Colonel Ingersoll, for president of the United States.

The late vindication of Charles Bradlaugh by his Christian peers, in expunging from the Journal the record of the bigoted exclusion from the British House of Commons of that champion of the rights of all (not excepting the Irish) for his Atheism, ought forever to solder the flippant tongues of all sacred slanderers to the dome of their fly-traps and melt their malicious pens in the fire of repentance. But no; the godly traducer will not cease from troubling the intelligent, honest, and brave, until the races of fools and frauds shall hav become extinct as the dodo. Robert Swail well sings:

When o'er mankind the church held sway,
In superstition's palmy day,
The arguments the priests adored
Were thumbscrews, fagots, fire, and sword.
Now, when of these they are bereft,
The only weapons they hav left
Are threats of Gods beyond the skies,
With personal abuse and lies.
Behind a wall of obscene Bibles,
They skulk and sling their slanderous libels.
With hate they load their gospel guns,
And poison shoot at freedom's sons.
But truth will silence soon their roar,
And priests will be believed no more.
The persecuting, slandering clan
No more will dwarf the mind of man.

Meanwhile we hav this thought to console us: Robert Court and all the unctuous crew of "unco guid," as named by Robert Burns, from the pope of Rome to Clarke Braden, may spout their spume at the shining stars of reason, but these bayers at the moon cannot rob those brilliant orbs of a single salient twinkle, whilst this shall be the ringing eulogy of every Atheist valiant for reform:

Well hast thou fought
The better fight, who single hast maintained
Against revolted multitudes the cause
Of truth, in word mightier than they in arms;
And for the testimony of truth hast borne
Universal reproach, far worse to bear
Than violence.

Letters to Workingmen.

I hav said man is essentially selfish. He does not like to admit it, because he has been taught to believe he ought not to be, and the desire not to be has grown to a conviction that he is not. Yet the motiv power to all action is self-happiness, the satisfaction of self. As in the old question of "the freedom of the will," we think of self as apart from the organism—like the advocates of Spiritism, who would make mind an entity. Scientific psychology and physiology prove it an illusion. The mind is but an expression of the brain, and self is the identity of mind and organism. The poet says,

It is the mind that makes the body rich, but it might as truthfully be said, It is the richness of the body that makes the mind. The simile of Longfellow is appropriate:

Though it leads, yet it follows;
Though it bends, it obeys.
Useless one without the other.

The organization of the individual is the essence of communism with the will, a true representativ governor. To gratify an idea is just as selfish as to gratify an appetite. The religious devotee who tortures his body,

In hope to merit heaven by making earth a hell, is just as selfish as he who "makes a god of his belly." Read the characters portrayed by Charles Dickens, with this idea in view. Jarndyce is found to be as selfish as Skimpole. We follow Jarndyce in all his eccentric ways in making others, in whom he is interested, happy, and the great satisfaction he finds in so doing. His charity to the Skimpole family, allowing them to liv in idleness according to their father's peculiar ideas; his hospitality to Skimpole, and his enjoyment of his guest's simplicity; his "growling," and the "east wind," what was it all but the artifice of a selfish nature. Esther was indignant when reading in Skimpole's autobiography that Jarndyce was a very selfish man, yet it was true, even as it would hav been true had Jarndyce written the same of Skimpole. Selfishness brought man out from brutehood. Let us cultivate it and trust it, the ego of man. What a lesson to woman was the action of the heroin of "An African Farm!" Lyndall preferred death and disgrace to the surrender of self, feeling that life in bestowing love must withhold liberty. She would hav none of it. Oh, the grandeur of dying Lyndall addressing her emaciated features as reflected from the little mirror: "We are not afraid, you and I; we are together; we will fight, you and I." "He that conquers himself is greater than he that taketh a city," saith the scripture, and there is no doubt but that it is of far more importance to cultivate, guide, and control ourselvs, than any city, society, or government. Still, the saying was founded upon a false premis—that the self is vile by nature, and all its desires carnal; that it must be "conquered," brought under subjection, after which the person's duty to his God requires that he should go out and help to conquer others, and this idea led to all the trouble which ushered in the Dark Ages.

Religious fanaticism and bigotry influencing the mind of the hordes of poor, ignorant slaves, they arose in all the ferocious anger of their God and crushed out the civilization of Greece, the light of reason and philosophy, which had reached a high degree, but which, alas! illuminated only the homes of an aristocracy; and it went out like a rush candle before a tornado when the angry populace arose in the fury of duty to its God. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again." Slowly but surely we are emerging from the darkness of faith to the bright light of scientific reason, and when we shall hav again reached the proud eminence occupied by those ancient philosophers, our position will be unassailable, for practical science, unknown to those sages, will enable us to verify our assertions, and introduce a new feature that destroys all ideas of aristocracy, by proving the lowness of our origin—that we are but the result of the forces of nature, the effects of causes beyond our control. We shall hav no God to thank that we are not as other men; but a generosity born of a knowledge that men, like blocks, are but as they are hewn, will abide with us. A sympathy for unfortunate humanity will build homes in place of prisons, and treat as diseased what now we punish as criminal. Experiments in hypnotism or mesmerism establish proof that our actions are the result of suggestion produced by physical or mental impressions, and these may be received and acted upon without the knowledge or coöperation of the will. The will power may be set aside or lie dormant without affecting physical action. Hence the individual is not always accountable for his actions, and hence the injustice of judging the actions of others. And this suggests the cultivation and improvement of self, the extension and dominion of the will power. The noblest and grandest expression of the human lips are the words, I will. Let us look into the mirror and say to our reflection, as Lyndall did: "We are all alone, you and I. No one helps us, no one understands us, but we will help ourselvs." And what is more, we will let others do the same. We owe allegiance to no soul but our own. We are in duty bound to no power but that of our own organization. Let us "dare assert the I" supreme. In other words, let us be selfish and mind our own business.

Yet I would not ignore man's social nature, nor that power which

Bid each on other for assistance call,
Till one man's weakness grows the strength of all.

Yet it seems to me that the harmony and beauty of society depend upon keeping distinct and clear—like notes in music—the various individualities; that true social laws hav so

Linked the general frame
And bade self-love and social be the same.

Selfishness is an essential of man's nature, yet, like everything else pertaining to that nature, it is susceptible of cultivation, improvement, and reform. Epicureanism has evolved from gluttony. Sex-love, the most beautiful thing in nature, has sprung from brutal lust. And intelligent selfishness is a different degree from animal satisfaction. Yet it is well to return to first principles to know that what is, is but a modification of what was; to feel that the source is no shame to the stream; that all our ideas of beauty, purity, and goodness are but the cultivated sense of the brute. It is well to go back over the road we hav traveled to view the snares and pitfalls our tired, ignorant ancestors tumbled into; to view again the false signs that led their ignorant feet astray. We may follow our ancestral line back to those fellows Mr. Pentecost tells of as having thin legs, small heads, and large abdomens; whom Ingersoll speaks of as having teeth twice as long as their forehead was high, with a spoonful of brains in the back of their orthodox heads, skulking through the forest afraid of their shadows. We may see them in this condition passing centuries and thousands of centuries with little or no improvement. Yet gradually a change is perceived. The rough stone age passes into the polished stone age, and countless ages roll on, but the ingenuity that put a finer edge upon the rough stone finally utilized other minerals. The necessity for better tools to kill their prey sharpened their ingenuity. Their teeth and nails grew blunt as their tools grew sharp. As their foreheads grew their teeth retired. And when the heretic came to the "gentleman in the dug-out" and insisted on improving his craft by putting a stick in the middle and a rag on the stick to catch the wind, his orthodoxy began to weaken. It is indeed a question of brains, a struggle between the forces of intelligence and the forces of superstition. But the hand of Science has written upon the walls of the Gods the legend, so plain no seer is needed to interpret:

Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Buffalo, N. Y. A. L. BALLOU.

Our London Letter.

The leading English journals hav been well-nigh unanimous in their expressions of opinion as to the important work done for humanity in general and his countrymen in particular by the late Charles Bradlaugh, and fully appreciate the national loss that has been sustained by his early decease. Some of them in their admiration of the man hav gone so far as to declare that he was a Christian, although he himself was not aware of the fact. From this it would appear that many professing Christians hav no knowledge of their own creed, simply imagining that a man whose private life is above reproach, and whose honesty is beyond question, must of necessity be a Christian, even when he openly avows his utter disbelief in the whole system of supernatural religion. Charles Darwin was a Christian of the same class according to these people's ideas. The fact is, the Christian ranks number so very few, if any, men of note in any department that they are intensely eager to claim every really great man after his death, no matter what his opinions on religious matters may be. Curiously enough, the Daily News, of which it is said Labouchere is part proprietor, calmly states that Charles Bradlaugh's "Atheism had never any vogue, and it was when he turned away from it to politics that he became influential with the working class." It would be interesting to know who inspired such utter nonsense as this. No doubt at some future time there will be tales told of a deathbed recantation overheard by some one who was not present, as in the case of Thomas Paine. W. R. Bradlaugh, the "evangelist," must be a very peculiarly organized individual. What he intended to convey by the reference to Job xxxiii, 15, 16, appended to the wreath he sent, may be known to himself, but to the general public they convey neither sense nor meaning. He must be a very small-minded man, as he has written an article in a religious paper with the intention of belittling his dead brother by giving a distorted account of incidents in his early life. Fortunately no one pays any attention to W. R. Bradlaugh, and his endeavor to emerge from his well-merited obscurity will meet with no success.

Undoubtedly the finest panegyric yet written has emanated from the pen of the editor of the Agnostic Journal, and no words of mine could possibly giv it anything like justice. It is much to be deplored that two such master minds were unable to work together. If they could hav combined forces they would hav carried everything before them, but it was not to be; they were so much alike and yet so different, both fighting for the same cause and yet so antagonistic to each other; but it is not in the nature of things for two Napoleons to be in the field together. It was unfortunate the two men were so separated from each other, and I cannot but think it was from a misunderstanding that might perhaps hav been rectified if only some one had known how to do it.

The National Reformer is, I see, to be continued under the editorship of Mr. Robertson, certainly the best man who could hav been chosen for the work, even apart from his having been sub-editor for some years. Under his direction the journal is not likely to decrease in interesting matter, and now that the political record will be eliminated more space can be devoted to Freethought articles, which, after all, is the most fitting matter for a Freethought paper.

A plan is on foot for erecting a suitable memorial to the late great Atheist. The idea seems to be to raise sufficient funds to erect a Freethought hall and institute, which is perhaps the best way of keeping his memory green. His extensiv collection of books will form a fine nucleus for a Freethought library, and no doubt many Freethinkers will leave their own collections to be added to it. At present a Freethought society cannot legally hold property, but the movement now working for the repeal of the law which is answerable for this iniquitous state of affairs will sooner or later be successful, and then it will be seen whether Freethought will not make far greater strides than Christianity ever did even when supported by the whole force of the Roman empire. The people who do all they can to keep us poor are never tired of taunting us with the little we hav to show in the way of handsome buildings and grand institutions, but when we hav the same freedom they possess, they will hav cause to open wide their eyes with astonishment at the progress that will be made.

Miss Craddock Answers Mr. Wettstein.

The ancient Danish king, Canute, who thought, by waving his scepter angrily over the bit of ocean at his feet, to check the rising tide—a tide which was rising not only in his small harbor, but all over the earth—has had his imitators in every age, and the latest copyist of King Canute is our good friend and quondam faithful upholder, Mr. Otto Wettstein.

Mr. Wettstein has chosen to accuse me, in public print, (1) of duplicity, in that I accepted the badge which he presented to me, although I advocated the pansy; and (2) of unwarranted presumption in sending out an attractiv and presumably expensiv circular, without first getting permission from the body of our members throughout the United States.

The second charge can be disposed of briefly. The Flag and Pansy pamphlet was not sent out upon my own responsibility, but with the unanimous and cordial approval of the entire board of directors. It was submitted in detail at a full board meeting, and certain additions and alterations there suggested were acted on by the executiv committee with scrupulous fidelity. As for taking a vote from the entire body of our members throughout the country every time that we get up a new circular, the very idea is absurd, and would soon stop the wheels of the American Secular Union. If we are to go into a committee of the whole for everything of this sort, it would be better to dispense with a board of directors altogether.

As to the charge of "duplicity," Mr. Wettstein does me the honor to publish a complimentary letter which I wrote, thanking him for the badge-pin which he so kindly sent me just before the Portsmouth congress. He adds that this badge was sent Miss Craddock "conditionally that she would wear it, which, of course, implied that she indorsed it as the most suitable emblem for Liberals." Indeed? In what way, pray, does my acceptance of a gift commit me to considering it the handsomest thing in the world? But let us see what Mr. Wettstein himself wrote me at the time:

ROCHELLE, ILL., Oct. 2, 1890.

MISS CRADDOCK, Esteemed Friend: I inclose my annual contribution to the American Secular Union, and only regret that at present it cannot be $100. . . .

Per prepaid ex. I also take the liberty to send you one of my small badges which I designed to represent emblematically the principles for which we agitate, and which in you and President Westbrook hav such noble champions. I hav read with great interest all your able and stirring contributions to the Liberal papers, and am satisfied that the present officers are doing all in their power to place our national society upon a solid footing. . . .

P.S.—As the occasional idiosyncrasies of certain ladies or gentlemen prompt them to refuse to wear badges of any kind—B. F. Underwood, for instance—you will kindly return the emblem I send should you object to wear it personally. Otherwise it is, I assure you, cheerfully presented as a token of recognition of the efficient services rendered in a good cause. WETTSTEIN.

It will be observed that there is not the slightest hint in the above letter of my being expected to "indorse" this badge "as the most suitable emblem for Liberals." Judging from this letter, almost anyone would say that the gift in question was an innocent and friendly token of esteem to me in my official capacity. And I very naturally accepted the badge, and wrote Mr. Wettstein a grateful letter—the letter which he published last week. Had there been the least hint given me of its being bestowed "for a consideration"—that consideration being the pledging of myself to advertise Mr. Wettstein's badge to the exclusion of everything else—it is needless to say that that pin would hav been returned to Mr. Wettstein forthwith. My conscience and my personal independence may hav no especial money value to the world, as the world rates those things; but they are everything to me, and I hav never yet received sufficient pecuniary inducement to part with them. And I really think they are worth a little more money than the price even of Mr. Wettstein's "diamond" badge.

When Mr. Wettstein's gift reached me, I had already drafted most of my speech for the Portsmouth congress. To hav omitted mention of the pansy in that address—even had I been so inclined, in order to help on Mr. Wettstein's badge trade—would hav been to giv the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out, as the pansy was one of the features of my discourse. I did consult one or two friends on the advisability of mentioning the "Torch of Reason" along with the "Pansy;" but we concluded that it might seem to bring the two into conflict, and raise hard feelings. However, I wore Mr. Wettstein's badge beside the pansy at the congress, and I am right glad and proud I was wearing it, too. Perhaps I should hav thought differently, had I realized that the giver was even then expecting me to return for his gift "a consideration," so to speak.

My position regarding the two badges is perhaps best explained by quoting the following from our new circular:

Various badges hav been from time to time adopted by Liberals. Perhaps the two best known are the "Freethought, Science. Reason vs. Superstition" of Otto Wettstein, and the "Universal Mental Liberty" of Lucy Churchill. Each of these sets forth an idea which we cannot afford to throw aside; and the wearing of one does not exclude the wearing of the other. It is hoped that they will be even more widely adopted than at present.

There is, however, need of a badge which shall express at first glance, without complexity of detail, that basic principle of freedom of thought for which Liberals of all isms are contending. This need seems to hav been met by the Freethinkers of France, Belgium, Spain, and Sweden, who hav adopted the pansy as their badge (French pensée, meaning thought). We join with them in recommending this flower as a simple and inexpensiv badge of Freethought.

It will be noticed that we hav no idea of bringing the pansy into competition with Mr. Wettstein's badge. Indeed, as late as Feb. 17, 1891, I wrote Mr. Wettstein as follows:

DEAR MR. WETTSTEIN: I hav received a letter from a lady in Los Angeles, who is trying to organize an American Secular Union auxiliary in her city, and she asks me if we hav a badge, as she thinks, and very justly, that we ought to show our colors. I hav told her, of course, of the pansy adopted by the Freethinkers of France, Belgium, Sweden, and Spain, and recommended by me at the Portsmouth congress; and I hav also described your badge at length, and given her your address. Perhaps it might be well for you to send her some descriptiv circulars and prices of your badge. I hav mislaid the circulars you sent me—possibly they hav been thrown away in the hasty clearing up just previous to the congress—and so I could not send her any. Her name is . . .

I want to thank you over again for the badge which you so kindly sent me. I wear it every day, and on all occasions, at evening companies, etc. . . . People ask me "What that badge is for?" and then I can use it as an entering wedge for a little "testimony," as the Quakers would say, on behalf of Liberalism. It has one disadvantage, however; it costs too much for those Liberals who are not blest with much of the world's goods to buy. In that respect, I think the pansy has an advantage. However, I trust sincerely that neither badge will ever become a rival to the other; each symbol has its work to do, and there seems to be no reason why either should supersede the other. At the Portsmouth congress, I wore both side by side.

However, Mr. Wettstein seems resolved to consider the two badges as necessarily opposed, even if other people do not so consider them. Last December one of our Western members (whose name I do not feel at liberty to giv without having his permission) wrote me:

I am anxious to hav introduced the "pansy" and the "flag" by circular, and also by lapel button, badge, and charm. As to this letter, I wrote Wettstein for prices, etc. The answer he sent is not encouraging. He seems to think his badge is the badge; that it is worn by thousands; and is to be worn by generations yet unborn.

Indeed, at the close of his article in last week's paper, Mr. Wettstein asserts with charming complacency his belief that even in France (which country first proposed the pansy) this floral emblem "will soon be superseded by the sun of science and the torch of reason." Why, then, if Mr. Wettstein feels so sure of this, does he take such alarm at the mere suggestion of the pansy? Can it really be that he fears he shall be called on ere long to do what he says he will when something better than his comes along—i.e., "cheerfully withdraw" his, and use his "utmost influence to induce all to wear the best badge?"

At all events, he seems to think the fact that the pansy is so easily and cheaply obtained, being "found upon every five-cent counter, in every millinery and jewelry establishment," etc., is against it. To my mind, this is an argument for it. Many of our people, who would not feel like paying out several dollars for one of Mr. Wettstein's pins, would gladly invest a few cents in the pansy pin. And why should one individual hav a monopoly of a badge for Liberals? Is this true Liberalism? Is not the essence of Freethought perfect freedom for all, irrespectiv of favorits?

But the pansy has another advantage in its adaptability to different tastes. It occurs in nature in an almost infinit variety of colors and markings—dark purple, lavender, yellow, brown, white, etc. Nor are its Freethought wearers confined to a jeweled brooch or a scarf-pin. They can wear the natural blossom in their buttonholes; they can embroider or paint it on silk or cardboard or ribbon; or stamp it on their envelopes and writing paper; in short, it can be used in a number of different ways by the same person and at comparativly slight expense, if one wishes. See how the Women's Christian Temperance Union has grown! What could be a more "common article of adornment" than a bow of white ribbon or white cord? And yet the women of that organization are proud to wear it; and from what I know personally of the workings of that society, I think it safe to assert that the wearing of this bit of cheap white ribbon or cord in their buttonholes has been one of the chief factors in the spread of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. "The white ribboners" are known far and wide throughout our country. When Freethinkers shall wear the pansy as persistently, Freethought too will become a political and a social power to an extent at present unknown among us.

Since the Portsmouth congress, I hav worn Mr. Wettstein's gift with pride and pleasure, every day until last evening, when I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER his denunciation of what he is pleased to call my "duplicity." This morning, after mature deliberation, I laid his badge away in my bureau drawer, as it seems to be no longer a gift, but an article for which a price is expected to be paid—a price which I am not prepared to giv. If Mr. Wettstein wishes it returned to him, he can hav it, by mail or express, as he may direct. If he wishes me to continue wearing it, let him say so, in a way which his innate sense of justice and courtesy tells him will approve itself to me. I think it would hav been in better taste had he offered his remonstrances to me privately by letter, where we could hav discussed the matter quietly and amicably, instead of airing his private grievances through the public press; but, since he has chosen the newspapers as his medium, I shall be constrained to request him to reply to the above alternativs through the same medium.

Dr. Holmes says, in his "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table:"

> Did you never, in walking in the fields, come across a large flat stone, which had lain, nobody knows how long, just where you found it, with the grass forming a little hedge, as it were, all round it, close to its edges,—and hav you not, in obedience to a kind of feeling that told you it had been lying there long enough, insinuated your stick or your foot or your fingers under its edge, and turned it over . . . ? What an odd revelation, and what an unforeseen and unpleasant surprise to a small community, the very existence of which you had not suspected, until the sudden dismay and scattering among its members produced by your turning the old stone over!

In the same way, Dr. Holmes goes on to say, do we create alarm when we overturn, or try to overturn, a long-established custom with the lever of reform. All the little people who hav thriven under its shadow are filled with terror when we seek to move the stone from over them.

With a slight change of figure, the same idea will perhaps apply to the American Secular Union—that splendid block of granit destined for the corner-stone of liberty's temple, but still far from its destination, and lying midway of the path of progress, waiting for the levers that shall move it forward. Through the past years it has rolled onward and stopped, rolled onward again and stopped again, by spells. Where it stops there are always lives to take shelter beneath it, adapting themselvs to the locality where it lies. But by and by the levers of a new administration move it onward a little further, and those who hav been sheltered temporarily by the rock are disturbed, annoyed, possibly embittered, by its shifting as the levers are plied. For my own part I would not cause inconvenience to any living creature, even the meanest insect that stings, if it could be avoided. But what are we to do? Shall we let our fair and mighty corner-stone lie there only halfway to its goal, for fear of disturbing a few lives that hav flocked beneath it for a time? Shall we not rather ply our levers manfully, lifting it onward, onward, still onward to its appointed place as the corner-stone of that splendid temple of freedom in whose building every true Liberal is taking a hand—a temple, or rather say a home, where not a few favorits, but all creatures alike, shall find shelter?

Let us remember that the law of life which never fails to work out relentlessly in the long run, is the law, not of favoritism, but of evolution, of survival of the fittest. Since Mr. Wettstein has chosen to bring his badge and the pansy badge into a needless competition, so be it! The fittest is bound to survive in the end. And when we remember that the pansy is adopted already by France, Sweden, Spain, Belgium, and that Germany is thinking of adopting it, it will be seen that the pansy has already a good start. I do not take up the numbers of enthusiastic letters which I hav received from Freethinkers on this side of the big water, both within and without our society, as we can well afford to wait for these until some time in the future, when they can hav a newspaper column or two to themselvs. Meanwhile, if it is to be a contest between the two badges, let us on either side possess our souls in patience. And, above all, let us not forget that the last, and not the least, of the Nine Demands which our constitution makes, includes "the promulgation of a universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity."

IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Sec. A. S. U.

The Pansy Pin.

I am in receipt of several letters asking my opinion of the proposed "pansy pin" as an emblem of American Freethinkers. I hav to say that I am not in favor of its adoption. It is a pretty enough idea and very sentimental. It signifies thought, but seems more appropriate for lovers' fancies and the affectionate regard of friendship than for the sturdy, irrepressible, wide-awake, independent, and somewhat aggressiv Freethinker of the times in which we liv.

The pansy is hardly expressiv enough, in my opinion, and, besides, it is already too common. Everyone almost has something, some ornament, in the pansy order. I hav owned a "pansy pin" more than ten years which was sent me from Switzerland. There are pins, ear rings, cuff buttons, charms, finger-rings, lockets, slides, bracelets, etc., now in the market, made in pansy shape or decorated with pansy forms. These are worn by all sorts of people, who cherish all shades of opinions—people who know nothing of, and care less for, Freethought. Thus the pansy would not be a symbol in our country for the recognition of Radical or Freethinking views.

And why should we seek another symbol or badge when we already hav one representing all that is necessary?

Otto Wettstein's beautiful pin is the handsomest emblem for Freethought. It is unique. It means something. It is representativ. You see at a glance what it is and know readily what it stands for. It is expressiv. It tells what it is, while the pansy signifies simply thought. Mr. Wettstein's pin shows the flaming torch of reason, the sunrise of science and Freethought illumining the universe, while the night of superstition lies in darkness and shadow below. If I might suggest any change at all in it, I would eliminate the word superstition entirely and substitute common sense, unselfishness, brotherly love, liberty, or some other equally appropriate word in its stead. And the colors I would hav red, white, and blue.

America should lead, not follow. It does not become an independent people like Americans to go to another country seeking an emblem to express their freedom and independence. America is in the advance—the greatest nation in the world. Let the badge of her noble workers for humanity and the rights of men be a product of the genius and industry of her own citizens. France might adopt our badge with credit and honor to herself, since it expresses so well our mutual views. No doubt French Freethinkers would do so, could they but see the very attractiv pin patented by Mr. Wettstein, who certainly deserves the patronage of Liberals everywhere. Let us not go to Wanamaker, or to any dealer who would crush us and injure our cause if he could, but let us send our orders to those who are with and for us, who love the cause that we love, and who are striving to make the world a better place for those who are to come, as well as for those who liv to-day.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Cain Lately Raised.

And it came to pass in the year that the Adam family were evicted from the Eden domain Mrs. Eve Adam sent for her regular practitioner, and lo! she was in a fair way to make Adam one of the most miserable of mankind.

How anxiously Mr. Adam walked up and down the adjoining room; how, when he heard a little squall, his face shone as a cherub's; how, when he heard a second, his face elongated like unto a bass viol as he sorrowfully muttered, "Eve, Eve, remember the Malthusian doctrin to keep it holy;" then, when the bald-headed disciple of Esculapius came, with oily smile, to pay his respects to Adam and receive his fee, how the irate father of mankind took the astonished doctor by the scruff of his neck and pitched him out into darkness where he lay weeping and wailing and gnashing his teeth, feeless—are these things not written in the Book of Jah? Now, it came about that the lad Cain grew apace and became a weary-limbed clodhopper. As he sadly skipped from furrow to furrow, followed by the old man and his flail, he often would cast envious eyes toward his brother as the latter sat upon a hill, playing upon his mouth-organ, with the wondering sheep at his feet.

For the lad Abel was the gentle shepherd of Antediluvia.

Then Cain's anger arose and he said, "Lo, my brother pulls a wire! I, even I, needeth to till the land, while he amuseth himself with Wagnerian selections. This must not be; it is not meet that the elder son should toil while the younger plays the dude!"

At eventide, as Cain was trying to get the kinks out of his back, he conceived of an idea.

"Ha!" laughed he sardonically, "I will even take my apples, my onions, my cherries, and my cabbages and hie me to the house of Jah, on whose front porch will I lay them as an offering. Then will I pull a string, aye, even a tow-rope."

So he gathered him some fruits of the ground, in which the worm was not, and sneaking around laid them on the doorsteps of Jah's mansion.

But in the cool of the evening as Jah went for a stroll, he smelt a most noxious exhalation proceeding from the porch of his new house, and he wot not what it was, saying, "Behold, I will cane that son of a painter who hath left his flesh-pots decaying in front of my new house!" And he foamed.

Then Jah entered the house by the backway (for he did not care to be seen, as the sanitary inspector might be around) and climbed to the second story, where, peering out of a window, he beheld the wilted cabbages and rotten onions of Cain's first offering!

And he waxed wroth and more so as the perfume rose higher and higher, and he vowed he would put his mark upon Adam's son and heir.

Behold, in process of time, it came to Abel's ears that Cain had stolen a march upon him in the good graces of the mighty Jah.

So Abel, taking one of his fattest lambs (with mint sauce and capers), went round to the back door of Jah's residence and gave them to the cook. As Jah sat in his sanctum playing "solitary," he smelled the burnt-offering of Abel.

And he opened his mouth saying, "Who is this that bringeth to the high and mighty Jah spring lamb and caper sauce?"

Then up spoke the cook, for a mighty man was he, "May it please your invisibleness, it was thy servant, Abel, he of Kalimizoo." And the Lord was pleased and showered blessings down upon Abel. But Cain, on learning the above, got tearing mad, even to the extent of making things lively at the diggings.

And behold, as Cain was ripping out a few profane remarks, old Jah pounced upon him, even as a hawk springeth upon a fat pullet, saying [Jah, not the hawk, sir], "Young feller, I've been layin' fur you, even you. If ever thou bringest around to my front stoop any of thy dog-rotted cabbages, I'll hang thee as high as Haman. Where is thy meat, thy spring lamb, for it is written, man cannot liv on rotten onions!"

"Alas, your greatness," moaned the unfortunate Cain, "I've nary a lamb."

"Then go West, young man," thundered the terrible Jah, "and rustle with the cow-punchers," and, turning away, Jah saluted Abel, his beloved of tithe-payers.

As Jah turned his back, Cain shook his fist at Abel, muttering, "Verily, ye gatherer of wool, I shall be even with you. I shall cause ye to see an aurora borealis when the old man gits."

And he did. For doth it not say "that Cain arose and slew his brother?" Yea, verily!

That day at dinner, Jah had no spring lamb or mint sauce, and he said to his cook, "Gabe, what's the matter with Abe?"

But Gabe wotted not.

So that evening, as Jah was looking out of his front bay-window, he espied Cain returning from his daily toil. Calling him to the door Jah asked, "Cain, where's Abe?"

"Say, old man," returned this son of Gall, "d'ye think I am a private intelligence office? What do I know about Abe?"

But at that moment the evening wind brought to the nostrils of Jah a smell so peculiar that, as the bald-headed buzzard knows, he knew blood had been spilt. And he looked at Cain, who trembled at his look, saying, "When thou resolvest thyself into a lynching party, young feller, thou oughtest to cover up thy tracks."

Then Jah laid hold of Cain, dusting up the road and two or three adjacent counties with him, until the latter thought he had been wrestling with a full-grown Dakota blizzard. And the Lord set his mark upon Cain—the same mark can be seen when the spirit of Cain has been raised in a political meeting—so that whoever should see him would know it was Cain, the fratricide, for Jah had so disfigured him that even his mother didn't recognize him. After Jah had so marked him, he made Cain tramp, hounding him off to the Land of Nod, the paradise of tramps unto this day. Here endeth the history of Cain. Selah.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON.

Misapplied Genius.

Talmage is probably the best specimen the world offers of misapplied genius.

He will make an enthusiastic, entertaining discourse with but a single word as a text, and if you do not reason over it, but just swallow it whole, it seems quite satisfying. His sermon on the word "Come" is an instance of this kind. It opens thus:

Texts: "Come."—Gen. vi, 18. "Come."—Rev. xxii, 17. Imperial, tender, and all-persuasiv is this word "Come." Six hundred and seventy-eight times it is found in the scriptures. It stands at the front gate of the Bible as in my first text, inviting antediluvians into Noah's ark, and it stands at the other gate of the Bible as in my second text, inviting the postdiluvians into the ark of a savior's mercy. "Come" is only a word of four letters, but it is the queen of words, and nearly the entire nation of English vocabulary bows to its scepter. It is an ocean into which empty ten thousand rivers of meaning. Other words drive, but this beckons.

Then he goes on and tells of invitations persuading one and another to "come" where wrong, evil, and wickedness lead down, down, down, and pleads that all such invitations be resisted, and the word be applied theologically, as "Come to Jesus." He tells the story of a wife whose husband had been overtarown by strong drink, and she went to the saloon where he was ruined, and she said: "Giv me back my husband." And the bartender, pointing to a maudlin and battered man drowsing in the corner of the barroom, said: "There he is—Jim, wake up; here's your wife come for you." And the woman said: "Do you call that my husband? What hav you been doing with him? Is that the manly brow? Is that the clear eye? Is that the noble heart I married? What vile drug hav you given him that has turned him into a fiend? Take your tiger claws off of him. Uncoil those serpent folds of evil habit that are crushing him. Giv me back my husband, the one with whom I stood at the altar ten years ago. Giv him back to me." Victim was he, as millions of others hav been, of the word "Come!"

He follows this sad narrativ with one of a different nature, thus:

I like the faith displayed years ago in Drury Lane, London, in a humble home where every particle of food had given out, and a kindly soul entered with tea and other table supplies, and found a kettle on the fire ready for the tea. The benevolent lady said, "How is it that you hav the kettle ready for the tea when you had no tea in the house?" And the daughter in the home said: "Mother would hav me put the kettle on the fire, and when I said, 'What is the use of doing so, when we hav nothing in the house?' she said, 'My child, God will provide. Thirty years he has already provided for me through all my pain and helplessness, and he will not leave me to starve at last. He will send us help, though we do not see how.' We hav been waiting all the day for something to come, but until we saw you we knew not how it was to come." Such things the world may call coincidences, but I call them almighty deliverances, and, though you do not hear of them, they are occurring every hour of every day and in all parts of Christendom.

How easy to make out a case when there is no one to show its flimsiness. If the widow's was an "almighty deliverance," what was that of the drunkard's wife? If a God sends the blessings, he just as surely sends the miseries. If he sends the deliverances, he just as surely sends the temptations and compels the results.

The widow's case of need was nothing to be compared with that of the poor woman whose husband had been so cruelly and deliberately ruined and destroyed. The whole world is ready to relieve a case of real, deserving need, but who had power to help poor Jim's wife? Her whole life might hav been one of prayer—of earnest, beseeching, supplicating prayer—and the innocent prayers of her little ones added to it, and atop of those the prayers of his old mother sitting in the chimney corner, the mother who had reared and loved him all her life; and yet of what avail? No "almighty deliverance" there. No, nor anywhere! The Gods are powerless. Gods of wood, brass, and stone; Gods of imagination; Bible Gods—not one of them lifts a finger. Man must become his own savior and redeemer. Man must educate and uplift the race. Man, with woman's help, advice, and guidance, will by and by be more noble, more divine, and more powerful for good than any God the world has yet pictured.

All great ideas, the race's aspirations,
All heroisms, deeds of rapt enthusiasts,
Be ye my gods [goods].

Freedom of Worship in the Institutions of New York.

At the regular weekly meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, the New York branch of the American Secular Union, Friday evening, March 20th, two hundred persons present, the following resolutions were adopted without a dissenting voice:

WHEREAS: A bill is now before the legislature of the state of New York known as the "Freedom of Worship" bill, the real purpose of which is to giv Catholic and other priests access to the House of Refuge to carry on religious services therein, and whereas the police magistrates of New York, acting under influence of the Roman Catholic church, hav manifested a determined purpose to commit children to the Catholic Protectory and other sectarian institutions rather than to the House of Refuge, where the expense of caring for them is less than at private institutions:

Resolved, That as members of the American Secular Union we are entirely opposed to permitting sectarian or religious exercises in any public institution, either with or without payment of priests or clergymen of any denomination for such services.

Resolved, That any other than purely secular teaching and exercises in our public institutions, such as it is the purpose of this bill to provide for, are entirely inconsistent with American principles of government.

Resolved, That rather than proceed further in the direction of establishing more intimate relations of the church and state, our legislators ought to provide at once for correcting the mistakes already made in this direction by doing away with all present arrangements by which public funds are misapplied to the care of the state's wards in sectarian institutions under the control of religious bodies and for their profit.

Resolved, That we therefore ask the legislature to reject this "Freedom of Worship" bill, and to substitute for it and enact one that shall cause all delinquents to be cared for only in public institutions, when at public expense, and exclude all religious services from them.

Prohibition vs. Anarchism.

Human nature in the aggregate presents to the student of ethnology a strange compound of incompatibles. It seems to be an innate quality common to the species, and often crops out in eccentricities, disastrous to the individual—a kind of mental malady, or psychic lunacy, that no training or knowledge, observation or experience, will correct. Some of the writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER seem to be affected with abnormal maniaphobia in their virulent and bitter hostility to Prohibition. Prohibition is civilization, and anti-Prohibition is Anarchism. In their rabid onslaughts on Prohibition, their attacks are without qualification or limitation, evidencing that they are opposed to all prohibition on principle.

It was prohibition, they should not forget, that helped to make them what they are; that gave them the civilized qualities they possess, and has enabled them to open this warfare on the principle they are indebted to for what there is of them above the untutored savage.

Prohibition begins with the cradle, and accompanies man all through life. It was law, civil statutes and enactments restraining the savage outlawry on the part of some who rebelled against morality and order, in invading others' rights, that prompted to prohibition.

It is the prohibition and the penalty, with the public sentiment that grows out of them, backs them up and maintains them, that is at the very foundation of civilization. It is to hold the vicious, the unfortunate and neglected, in restraint, till the gradual influence of education, training, and disciplin will operate as motivs to take the place of compulsory enforcement by prohibition and punishment.

Prohibition, as a principle, has heretofore been, and will long continue to be, indispensable to civilization, and the man who fights it is an enemy to a beneficent institution that is securing to him his right to liv as something more than a savage.

The sober, industrious, and orderly portions of society must defend themselvs against those Anarchists who would heartlessly victimize them, and defeat all their efforts in elevating their lives and improving their domestic and social condition. The Ten Commandments is one of the earlier prohibition codes enacted to help men out of savageism.

Our modern anti-Prohibitionists, unless they misrepresent themselvs, would favor and advocate the repeal of these prohibitory injunctions, and turn the savage element loose on society, ad libitum, to commit their depredations. For if there is no prohibition, there can be no penalty.

If these revilers of the present anti-saloon movement are not Anarchists in the most ultra and offensiv sense, then they are Prohibitionists. They must believe in some kinds of prohibition. Perhaps they favor prohibitory statutes and penalties against murder, highway robbery, arson, and some other gross offenses against society. Yet all these crimes combined are not equal in their devastations on society, in their malign consequences, to those that flow directly and indirectly from the licensed saloon traffic in intoxicating beverages. No man with his eyes open, and with an honest purpose to see the facts, weigh their import, and count the cost of this accursed traffic, can fail to see the horrors and enormities that produce such wide-spread desolation.

In the material world man as an animal confronts prohibition at every turn, in natural law, or the laws of nature. Fire, water, air, earth, gravitation, temperature, poison in solid and gases, in the excesses or abuses of which he reads and feels the penalty attached, is suffering and death. These are nature's fixed prohibitions for man as an animal.

In the moral or immaterial world of thought and feeling, to which man under culture has emerged, prohibitions are no less essential and indispensable, and his enlightened moral instincts prompt him to formulate them.

For the sentence of death is the penalty for anarchy in the moral, as certainly as it is written in the material the fate of the transgressor.

Men enslaved by their prejudices, embittered by their revenges, bigoted in their hatreds, may doggedly deny and sneer at the well-established facts and statistics, the careful calculations, and logical conclusions and estimates drawn therefrom. It is the testimony of grand juries, of criminal courts, of wardens of prisons and penitentiaries, of superintendents of reformatories, houses of refuge, almshousss, and charity organizations, that nearly all the criminals, pauperism, vagrancy, and destitution are the product directly or indirectly of the drunkenness and waste that result from the public protection and moral support given to this legalized rum traffic, forming a school of vice for the training of young men and boys in the habits of tippling and dissipation.

We hav yet to learn of any government, either civil or ecclesiastical, which included among its subjects all classes and ages of the population, that has been a success without having incorporated in it the principle of prohibition. It will not be denied that such a society could be maintained, composed of educated, disciplined, and cultivated adults of mature years.

But wherever governments hav existed, or are likely to exist in the very near future, a large proportion of the governed must remain without that intelligence, docility, and high moral sense to always act with such wisdom as to never wrong one another.

Young children cannot know what is right or best, or what is wrong, and till their minds are developed by experience and example, their judgments are matured, they must be held in restraint by the authority and force of the will of the parent.

A large proportion of the parents hav not the capacity to instruct and disciplin children judiciously. These grow up in ignorance and without opportunity of ever becoming qualified for self-government through moral restraint.

Children who are taught to lie, and steal, and cheat, and practice deception and injustice, can seldom be found to do right or to submit to any just regulations without prohibition, nor even with it, while suffering all the penalties attached to its violation.

Until all the population arrives to a point of moral excellence when everyone will possess absolute self-control over the passions and impulses, prohibition will be a requisit part of government. Till all children can be taken in infancy from ignorant, incompetent, vicious parents, and be kept away from their vulgar, coarse, and demoralizing influence, and not be corrupted by drunken habits, licentious lives, improvident or filthy practicss, and are carefully trained and disciplined in mind and morals for self-government, we will need prohibition. Our public school system professing to provide education for all children, is the beginning of a policy that must be carried much further in elevating character before its benefit will supplant the need of prohibition.

School laws are prohibition laws to protect society from the depredations of fools and the evils and crimes that result from ignorance. The petty vices and immoralities, the degradations and brutalities, of an ignorant population, are a constant menace, impediment, and drawback to civilization, which every enlightened, cultivated citizen believes in prohibiting as far as practicable, by enacting and enforcing a school law and making education compulsory as far as public sentiment will sustain it. Education is a civilizer. The educated villain is the exception, whose moral sense in childhood was ignored, overlooked, or neglected, for which he is not so much responsible as his parents and teachers.

All the Liberals who uphold the Nine Demands are prohibitionists. They all favor the necessary legislation, which is prohibition of the liberties and privileges religion is taking in invading the civil institutions, the schools and educational provisions, the military systems, and opportunities open to it to propagate its dogmas and doctrins. Anti-Prohibitionists certainly cannot object to this, and are with the church in any attempt on the part of Prohibitionists to curtail their liberties to do what the gospel and their conscience require of them as a religious duty. Of course no real, true, consistent Liberal could disapprove of this freedom of conscience.

Certainly none of these anti-Prohibitionists, in our country where we recognize the right of majority rule—if the influence of the majority is in favor of having the Bible read in the public schools—can object to it, nor can they consistently favor any prohibitory law to prevent it.

These opponents of Prohibition certainly would deprecate any efforts on the part of a minority to ask for a compulsory law to prohibit the exemption of churches from taxation.

If the churches hav a majority of public sentiment in their favor, it would be a personal, selfish jealousy on the part of any Liberal to want to restrict the church in its constitutional rights by any legal prohibitory measures.

Yes, but the anti-Prohibitionist says our Constitution, which secures liberty of conscience to all, makes no provision for these special privileges for religion, and all these encroachments of the church on the civil, military, and educational rights of the people are unconstitutional outrages of aggression on freedom.

If they are, then what civil or legal power has made them so but the prohibition in the Constitution? Then prohibition makes them so; but you are opposed to Prohibition, and to be consistent with your own pretensions and professions of hostility to Prohibition you should institute a crusade in favor of a repeal of all these constitutional prohibitions and carry out your principles like little men to their legitimate and logical results.

These Nine Demands are all asked to be secured by laws, to prohibit religion and the church from intrenching unduly on the rights and consciences of the anti-Prohibition Liberals.

They want these prohibitions when they know Prohibition does not prohibit and should not prohibit.

They know that no law can prevent or prohibit a member of Congress from praying in private or in the house if it is secret and silent prayer. All the sensible Liberal wants or asks for is that he should not by law or rule be obliged to contribute his funds, his legal and moral support, by acting with a party, for religious practices and beliefs, that he opposes, because they are frauds and superstitions.

In asking for this he convicts himself of being a full-fledged Prohibitionist, and at the same time he disparages and criticises his brother Prohibitionists for refusing to support a political party and a law that compels him to contribute his money and political influence to uphold the rum traffic, the source of more crime, pauperism, immorality, and lawlessness than all the other prohibitions combined in the Nine Demands could prevent if they were granted; and a thousand times more evils than they are producing, or can produce, if they are allowed to continue in defiance of his claims.

These anti-Prohibition Liberals are queer fellows; they want their speculativ religious prohibitions established; but no prohibition of the causes of degradation, sensuality, pauperism, crime, and taxation.

The Prohibitionists know that Prohibition will not prohibit the people from drinking any more than from praying. To do that is not their prospect or purpose. Nor is that the object in any sense of the Prohibition party. It is only to ask for a law that will exempt them from a compulsory support of the rum traffic, civilly, morally, and financially; knowing as they do its enormity as a business, judged from its results. They know the moral sense and just indignation of the community would suppress it at once were it not protected as a foul and leprous pet of the laws, for bibulous politicians and their tippling and drunken henchmen and hangers-on, who giv their political support to the party or parties that giv them the rum.

All statutes or legal enactments are to establish intelligent, orderly, uniform methods of transacting business among civilized men, and to prohibit abuses and wrongs being inflicted by the few, who through cunning, shrewdness, or strategy would outwit, oppress, and trespass on the rights of, the ignorant, incompetent, or less unfortunate. Laws are but prohibitions to protect the weak from the aggressions of the strong. That the law does not always succeed in this, and bad men, Anarchists, and the unscrupulous from habit, through technicalities or perversions defy law, or misconstrue it to promote their own selfish gains, only shows a defect in the precision and rigidity of the law, and that it is not sufficiently prohibitory.

As the principle and purpose of all law is prohibitory, the man who opposes prohibition is opposed to the law, if he claims to hav any consistency in his faith; and in spirit, principle, and purpose is an Anarchist, in the most lawless and savage sense of that word. He may deny the allegation and try to prove it false by the testimony of his orderly, moral, and exemplary life. But he must not claim that his good life is the result of his principles, for that would be impossible. It is the effect of the workings of the principle of prohibition, enforced on him and around him by the society of those who believe in prohibition and so protect him and his class from being victimized by falling a prey to their own Anarchistic principles.

If laws had been enacted by the British government prohibiting the slave trade and slavery in the American colonies, and if when the Constitution of the United States was adopted it had contained a prohibition of slavery in the states—admitting that it did not entirely prohibit it—it would hav placed the moral sense of the best people on the side of law and made slavery Anarchy; it never could hav made the arrogant demands it did, nor could it hav had the power to rise in rebellion, that produced a waste of life and treasure exceeding anything known in the history of the race. This is an example of the beautiful fruits of anti-prohibition Anarchism, which the enemies of Prohibition can contemplate with such complacency.

These enemies of Prohibition hav no claim on, and can claim no protection from, the law. If they are robbed of all their property, abused and maltreated, they certainly would be happy in their martyrdom in the hands of savages, in showing the world their conscience, their faith, and their conscientious devotion to their humane principles.

If the Anarchist is so disgusted and outraged at the evils of law and civilization—which we all own do exist, on account of the Anarchical principles and proclivities not yet eliminated from civilization—does he expect to improve his condition by abrogating all law, all prohibition and restraint, and returning to unqualified savagery?

If the Chicago martyrs were not prohibitionists, but were Anarchist in principle, even if they did not commit the overt act of using the dynamite, they should be happy and rejoice to hav the opportunity of proving their sincerity and their undaunted and whole-souled devotion to the exalted and sublime principles that animated them. All anti-Prohibitionists, or Anarchists, must feel honored and immortalized in the fate of their brother martyrs, just as one tribe of savages would when it falls a prey to the rapin and destruction of a stronger tribe.

To die for a principle, however damnable, is noble, heroic, godlike, glorious, they believe.

Prohibition does not prohibit, is the cry of the Anarchist, therefore it is a failure, a fraud, and an imposition on personal rights.

There is probably not a statute on record that has not, in principle or purpose, in spirit or letter, sometimes been violated by some one, therefore it did not prohibit, and on that account it is a failure and fraud. To be consistent, the Anarchist would hav all law abrogated.

While prohibition has done immensely to bring us up from savagery, there is much openly avowed and secret Anarchism and outlawry yet to overcome by enforcing all the necessary prohibitory laws and usages among the lawmakers and executors, and the nominally law-abiding, before prohibition has done its work.

The Anarchist opposes prohibition and hates it, because of the abuses and extremes to which religion or the churches are trying to carry it in their own interest by prohibiting Sunday work and Sunday amusements, and in suspending all public and private activity on their so-called holy day. The hearts of these pious zealots are right, yet their heads are wrong. But are sensible men to refuse to do what is necessary and right for their own welfare and that of society, because others abuse this right? Are we to refuse to do a thousand things that would be wholesome and for our own interests, because religious people do the same things, and, in their ignorance and zeal for religion, sometimes abuse these same good things? To do so would be very silly.

We all know that Prohibition will not make society perfect nor banish drunkenness, but it will withhold from the accursed traffic in alcoholic beverages the sanction of the law and moral sense of the community, and be a public protest against the state or the nation deriving a revenue of hundreds of millions of dollars by sanctioning and licensing a traffic in a poison which can do no other than injure, ruin, and destroy its victims. The millions who are living on this traffic produce nothing in return for the support they receive from hard-working, honest industry, but poverty, crime, lawlessness, and insanity; for the maintenance of which the industrious and frugal are taxed, and are sponsors for all its abominations.

It is difficult to reconcile the incongruities existing between intelligent Liberalism and Anarchism, or see how any Anarchist can hav a proper sympathy and interest in the welfare of his fellow-beings. It must be that his bibulous habits hav paralyzed, stupefied, and debauched his mental powers, and disqualified him for discerning good from evil; or he must be a victim to spite, passion, and prejudice, till, Samson-like, in desperation he would sooner pull down the pillars of society, involving his own destruction, than join in the philanthropic effort of removing the temptations from the young and weak, that they may hav an easier pathway to a higher and purer civilization.

Drinking and drunkenness hav done more to degrade man physically, morally, and mentally, and to keep him groveling in a state of social vassalage, a victim to the ills and oppressions of the sober and clear-headed, than all other causes combined.

The drunkards' families and their descendants can seldom rise from their inherited disadvantages, the constitutional imbecility, and incapacity to meet life's struggles successfully, but are crowded out to form the lower caste or substratum of society.

They are the weaklings that priests and politicians use to aid themselvs to place and power. They are the class to be used against Liberalism, which seeks to subvert priestcraft. So that the Liberal who opposes Prohibition, indirectly supports the powers of the priesthood. T. E. LONGSHORE.

Soul-Computation.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 7th Mr. W. W. Walker essays to confute my proposition in a former issue that if immortality were true, a plethora of souls in space would be the inevitable result, precluding future soul-evolution, which would be tantamount to asserting the finiteness of nature. He answers what he calls my "very remarkable statements" by the still more remarkable assertion that the aggregate population of the earth up to date, according to his figures, is twenty trillions of souls, who, allowing a small fraction less than four square feet to each person (or soul), could all stand on the territory of the United States. This is the pith and substance of his figuring, and I need not therefore enter into its details. Now I ask, what reader of Brother Walker's soul-computation who has any knowledge of the history of this planet whatever was not impressed with the idea that his statement was a far more "remarkable" one than mine? One of the greatest scientists has been accredited with remarking that "every handful of earth and rock of the earth's crust represents a human grave." How does this rough estimate tally with Brother Walker's arithmetic? Swell up every handful of earth and rock into the size of a human body (or spirit), and how many million times larger than our planet would he compute the entire mass to form? His mathematics, formidable though it appears, must certainly, therefore, be so only on paper. To start aright, is half the battle won. Now, I could giv him a logarithmical computation based upon the estimate of three children to every couple since the time of Adam and Eve, a computation made by one of our best mathematicians, showing that over six hundred thousand quintillion "souls" hav already seen the light of day, which, if piled on top of each other, would form a spiritual halo around this earth many million miles in diameter, taking this planet for its center. When we now consider that every planet in our system, and the sun itself, no doubt, will at some time evolve the same life and mind as our planet does at the present period of eternity, must the entire soul-product of our system after its evolutionary period has passed not come in close proximity to the environs of our adjacent systems, vast though the distances that intervene between them be? And must the souls of these neighboring systems—seeing that every world in space has sprung from the same parent stock, the cosmic energy pervading it, which must produce essentially the same life as our planet—not be radiated toward our system so that they eventually will meet? Is such meeting of souls from the various systems diffused through space not inevitable, seeing that perpetual additions are (believed to be) being made? Will the same processes of soul-radiation not go on beyond our neighboring systems, each one throwing off its soul-product to the next, that to the next again, and so on to infinity? We see what a prodigious result can be attained in a few thousand years by one little planet alone, but even though it took as many millions, or even trillions, of years, what it takes thousands to actually accomplish—whatever this actual result within a stated period may be—what is any specified term to eternity? A mere bagatel! No more than an hour to us earthworms who gage everything by our limited standards. In claiming immortality for their being, believers fail to form an adequate concept of eternity. Let them consider that we are now in only one of an infinit number of world-generations, and can anyone doubt that the same mind-evolving processes hav been going on during every one of the world-epochs that hav preceded those in existence now, and that they will likewise continue during every one of the infinit cycles of generations to come? Then what need is there, in fact, of any soul compensation at all, seeing that a question of time within which the soul-products of the various systems must meet, is of no consequence to eternity?

Say that instead of Mr. Walker's assumed period of two hundred thousand years a trillion years, or even as many ages, will be required before the soul-products of the world will meet, precluding further soul-evolution, do you realize, ye believers in immortality, that we hav actually arrived at the end of this vast period of time now? Why? Because you or I hav not specified the commencement of this term! You admit the eternity of nature, no doubt, but this involves an admission that there was no beginning to mind-evolution, hence your own specified period during which a plethora of souls would result in space began a trillion years, or ages, ago, so that we hav now reached its termination! (Checkmated, are you?)

But if a trillion ages do not suffice, in your estimation, to produce such a result, make it longer, extend it back into eternity, or ahead into eternity, as far as you please, the final result is the same, the soul-products of the infinit number of life-evolving worlds must meet at some time and then space is full, which means that Nature may as well "step down and out" for want of further room to stow away her souls in. You can't dodge the issue, wriggle and wiggle as you may.

If, then, it is evident that soul-evolution implies the annihilation of nature, the fact that an eternity of her existence has not impaired her potentiality, of which postulate we perceive unquestioned proof all around us, demonstrates the fallacy of the doctrin of life everlasting.

A sage was once asked: "What is eternity?" to which he replied: "On an island in the Indian sea lies a diamond mountain, and every century a bird comes to rub its little bill thereon, and when the entire mountain has been worn off, a moment of eternity has passed." I was reminded of this when I read Mr. Walker's reassuring (!) remark that "our believers in immortality—in view of the figures presented by him—need entertain no serious apprehension of being crowded for a while yet."

"For a while!" This is begging the question with a vengeance. It is assuming that we are in the commencement of soul-evolution, hence there is no danger that space will be filled with spirits "yet for a while!" That's our Agnostic friend's sublime conception of eternity, and a sample of his still sublimer logic. But seeing that he has resorted to assumption to strengthen his case, let us apply a little of the same plaster to our side of the matter, to see which has the greatest sticking properties.

And furthermore, does this very assertion that space will not be filled with souls "yet for a while" not contain a tacit admission that it will be thus filled after a while?

We will assume, then, for argument's sake, and also to expand his conceptions of eternity somewhat, that his figuring of the number of souls evolved on this planet so far, is correct; nay, let us go farther than that and suppose that only one soul is evolved every year from each one of the infinit number of life-generating worlds in space, considering now that this process is perpetual and had no beginning, being transferred from every dead or dying planet to its next successor, the startling fact confronts us that even at this slow rate of soul-evolution the whole universe would hav been filled with souls centillions of ages ago, because a sufficient time had elapsed prior to this period to produce such a plethora, the very lowest rate of increase continued during the entire infinit past inevitably producing such a result.

Therefore, what is any stated period to eternity? Space would indeed hav been filled in the past an infinit number of times over and over again, if immortality were true, a paradox on the face of it, as it can be filled but once.

Now pit your assumption against mine, Brother Walker, and your own candor shall decide which will "stick."

Immortality then implying a plethora of souls, no matter how large the chunk you are minded to slice out of eternity to produce it in, and such plethora involving nature's annihilation, we hav no alternativ but either to reject the dicta of science of nature's eternity, or to renounce the doctrin of life everlasting. One or the other must go. Conciliation between them is not conceivable.

An immmortality that is circumscribed by a few limited periods of a finite planet, or the duration of which is computable, is a misnomer in its very appellation.

It may be answered to all this that spirits are not to be gaged by our physical bodies, to which I will reply that the most advanced school of spirit philosophy holds that they are subject to the same law of dimension as when in the flesh, retaining the same proportions and size. Spirit "essence" is indeed considered to be the finer element of the individual, preserving the integrity of his physical and mental idiosyncrasies, as constituting his or her distinguishing features, inviolate. Without such preservation of characteristics and form, recognition in the "spirit-land" would indeed be impossible. Neither could one spirit merge or blend into another, as this would destroy the identity of both. Hence it is believed that they occupy the same amount of space as when in their fleshly "tabernacle," and as this space must be somewhere within the universe, it matters not how remote they may be, or how far they may sojourn from their parent planets, the occupancy of the interstellar spaces separating the life-evolving worlds, seeing nature has eternity to accomplish it in, is only a question of time. Therefore what folly to resort to mathematics to confute this self-evident fact!

Does Brother Walker still wonder that I cannot believe in immortality? H. WETTSTEIN.

The Liberal Association of Texas.

The annual meeting of the Liberal Association of Texas will be held in San Antonio, April 10th–12th, 1891, to which all Liberals are respectfully invited.

The objects of the Association are:

1. To encourage the study of man in all his relations.

2. To seek to realize the truth in life.

3. To aid in those movements that tend most to the improvement of the individual and of society, and to the unity and freedom of mankind.

4. To facilitate the association of those who hav at heart and hold dear that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.

5. To inaugurate a system of positiv, tolerant thought, ethical culture, and practical benevolence, in which all Liberal-minded people can unite and work in harmony, for the moral elevation, intellectual improvement, social well-being, and consequent happiness of the human race.

No confession of faith in any religion; no adherence to any special system of philosophy; no alliance with any particular political party, will be demanded of those who desire to participate in the meeting; the simple indorsement of its objects, and a willingness to work for their accomplishment, being the only requirement.

Will Want to Read Heston's Shoutin' Joe.

From the Denison, Tex., Sunday Gazetteer.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Company, of New York, hav placed on our table a copy of their useful ANNUAL for 1891. In addition to the usual calendar pages for each month and valuable condensed historical information accompanying, it contains about a hundred pages of refreshing original reading matter. The first article is a brief review of Freethought progress in the country during 1890; then follows the story of the year abroad. "Some Alaskan Myths," by Ida C. Craddock, is an instructiv article in a field few hav investigated. Thaddeus B. Wakeman has contributed a chapter on "Spooks." The next article tells where "the Roman Catholics Got a Litany." "Side Lights on South Sea Missions," illustrated, by Ada Campbell, furnishes information not to be found in the foreign mission reports. Mr. A. B. Bradford contributes a thoughtful article entitled, "Disadvantages of Specialism in the Advocacy of Reform." "Shoutin' Joe" is a story by Watson Heston, with illustrations by himself. Those who are familiar with the productions of Mr. Heston's pencil will want to read this story. The ANNUAL will be mailed by the publishers for twenty-five cents.

The Battle With Indecency.

Some of the good ladies of Philadelphia—Mr. Wanamaker's own village—hav made themselvs prominent lately by protesting against the exhibition of paintings of nude female forms in an art gallery. They claim such exhibition to be offensiv to modesty and tending to subvert respect for decency and morality. They therefore asked the managers of the gallery to remove them.

The Reverend Samuel Small, who was in Mr. Wanamaker's village at the time, told a congregation of these objectors how Georgia deals with people who try to subvert respect for decency and morality. Under Georgia's laws, said Mr. Small, the publisher who sends immoral prints or papers into the state, though he reside in New York, for example, is held to hav violated the laws of Georgia. Some time ago a number of copies of the Police Gazette were sent there for sale. Thereupon the governor of the state made a requisition upon the governor of New York for the publisher of the Police Gazette. On being tried in Atlanta, he was sentenced to a fine and to four months in the chain gang on the streets. The latter part of the penalty was waivèd, he giving his solemn pledge that no copies of the paper should ever again be sent to the state. "If a man," added Mr. Small, "should paste upon the walls of Atlanta such pictures as are seen on all the walls in Philadelphia, representing half-nude women, he would spend the following night in jail."

Now we cannot suppose that Mr. Wanamaker can of his own responsibility arrest, try, and imprison people for mailing publications offensiv to modesty, but according to his last report the law clothes him with power to decide what books are or are not of the character alluded to, and he is also compelled (so he says) to act when applied to in such cases. And now that his fellow-villains of his own village hav begun a crusade against indecent things, we really hope that he will coöperate with them to the extent at least of deciding upon the mailable qualities of a work sent him from this office some six weeks ago. The title of the book was as follows:

HOLY BIBLE,
CONTAINING THE
OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS:
TRANSLATED OUT OF
THE ORIGINAL TONGUES;
AND WITH THE FORMER TRANSLATIONS DILIGENTLY COMPARED AND REVISED.
NEW YORK:
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
INSTITUTED IN THE YEAR MDCCCXVI,
1890.

Up to the present time we hav heard nothing from the post-office department in relation thereto, not even an acknowledgment of the receipt of the book. But now that the postmaster-general finds himself backed up by the good women of his burg in objecting to things calculated to subvert respect for decency, it is hoped he will hav sufficient courage to consider the work sent him. We are extremely anxious for an official ruling in the matter to guide us in our publishing department.

Let him emulate in his own sphere the patriotic and moral conduct of the city council of Mankato, Minn., which has decided to keep the bill-boards in that city free from obscene pictures, particular objection being made to lithographs of amazons in tights and ballet-dancers in short dresses. Our postmaster-general can at least do for the mail-bags what the Mankato council has done for the bill-boards of that town—that is, if he finds the book sent him to be offensiv to modesty. There is no computing the damage possible to mail-bags and bill-boards by being compelled to bear salacious matter. Fiat justitia, ruat cœlum.

Lost Ground.

If anyone thinks the Liberals of the country hav no work before them to preserve their independence and obtain justice, let him ponder on the news of just one week, as it bears on the matter.

In last week's TRUTH SEEKER Mr. C. B. Reynolds reported the work done in its state by the Washington Secular Union. Our readers were made glad by the following information:

"Thanks to the indomitable energy of our treasurer, Geo. M. Boman, and the efforts of the Washington Secular Union, the revenue bill passed by the last legislature decrees that all church property, private school, and hospital property shall be taxed at full valuation."

There was, however, a string to this, of this color:

"I received a letter from a member of the house committee on the revenue bill, himself an earnest Liberal, informing me that the emergency clause was not attached to the bill because it was understood the churches should hav one year of grace to pay their taxes, so they could not complain that it was a burden suddenly sprung upon them."

That was a strong string, and the church people showed mighty good—or bad—sense in attaching it to the taxation law. The ink was barely dry on Mr. Reynolds's report before he wrote us as follows:

"The legislature of our state, the most vile, infamous, and rotten and corrupt that has ever misrepresented any people, has, during the last days of its sessions, repealed the law taxing church property. Conscious of their iniquity, they, Christian-like, seek to bribe God by robbing honest people and making an offering of the plunder to his church."

So it seems that the work of Mr. Boman has gone for nothing, and that through the complacency and good nature of a member of the house committee on the revenue bill the churches hav never paid a dollar of the public burdens, and will not hav to do so until the law is reënacted.

On this subject Mr. Reynolds closed his congratulatory report in these words: "We need to heed the admonition of Washington—'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.'" It appears that some one has slipped up in his vigilance—probably some "earnest Liberal" of a legislator who is also a politician.

In New York state the assembly is going further than ever in the direction of exemption. "Jimmy" Husted, "the Bald Eagle of Westchester," has introduced a bill exempting from taxation all the property of the Young Men's Christian Associations in the state. This is a bare-faced steal, because the buildings of these associations are generally built in business streets, with stores and offices to let, from which are derived large revenues. The Young Men's Christian Association headquarters in this city brings to its owners many thousands of dollars annually in rentals. Even Trinity church corporation, with all its wealth and power, never dared to ask for exemption for its business buildings as the conspirators in the Young Men's Christian Association hav done.

We hav done what we could to head off this rage for exempting the property of piety, but it will avail little if a wide and deep public sentiment is not aroused. Two weeks ago we printed a list of the Assemblymen at Albany. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the state write to his Assemblyman, at Albany, protesting against these measures.

From Pennsylvania also comes bad news. The house committee to which was referred Representativ Fow's bill modifying the Blue law statutes of 1797 has reported the bill unfavorably, and the reform movement is probably dead. Pennsylvanians are still to be ruled by the notions of people who hav been dead nearly a hundred years.

This result has been achieved largely by the efforts of the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, who has spent forty days in "Sabbath Reform work" in the western part of the state, holding meetings to protest against the modification of the law, and against Sunday opening of the World's Fair. He has also "raised about $2,500 at these meetings, a large part of which is devoted to Sabbath literature to follow up these meetings."

Another step backward in Pennsylvania is the introduction of prayer at the opening of the term of the state supreme court in Philadelphia. The prayer was long, strictly orthodox, and the union of church and state, so far as that court can make it, is complete. A religious journal, in commenting favorably upon this mesalliance, givs the result of an inquiry made as to this practice in other states. It finds that in Massachusetts each sitting of the supreme and superior courts of the state, and also each term of the United States courts, is opened with prayer, some clergyman being invited for the purpose. The same custom prevails in Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire, except that in the former state "the chaplain of the court" is a sort of recognized officer, and entitled to sit upon the bench with the judges. In Rhode Island, the district court, but no other, is opened with prayer at the beginning of the term. In Connecticut, the terms of the supreme court of errors, and the criminal terms of the superior court, are opened on the first day of the session with prayer. And this is in a country in which church and state are supposed to be separate!

Ohio has fallen into line in a tuppenny-ha'penny sort of way and exempted charitable societies and religious associations from the payment of license fees when they giv exhibitions. Tennessee has given the grand juries "inquisitorial power in cases of disturbance of public worship," and on top of that has passed a law that freight trains shall not be run in the state on Sundays.

In this jungle of religious fanaticism, where the wild beasts of tyranny and bigotry sneak triumphant, the only clear spot is the refusal of the California legislature to pass a Sunday law. But if the people of that state do not unceasingly exercise that eternal vigilance so eloquently recommended by Mr. Reynolds—but which some one in his state failed to practice—they will hav a Sunday law tying them hard and fast before they realize what has struck them.

A Minister Refuted.

A Western friend sends us this clipping, with a request for refutation through THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"Last Sunday evening Rev. A. B. Brown, pastor of the Presbyterian church in Sehome, Wash., preached a sermon very appropriate to the occasion. It was in reference to the Christian in public school life and the need of recognizing the teachings of the Bible in all public affairs. He quoted Andrew Jackson's famous words uttered in his last illness when questioned concerning the welfare of our country: 'That book, sir,' pointing to the Bible, 'is the rock on which our republic rests.' Also Daniel Webster's words, 'If we abide by the principles of the Bible our country will go on prospering and to prosper; but if we and our posterity neglect its instructions and its authority, no man can tell how a hidden catastrophe will overthrow us and bury all our glory in profound oblivion.'

"At the close of the discourse Mr. Brown referred to Lincoln's firm decision when he said to his cabinet after the battle of Antietam, 'I hav made on my knees a solemn vow before God, that if the enemy were driven back I would crown the result with the proposed declaration of freedom,' and then drawing forth a pocket New Testament said, 'I am right, for I know that liberty is right for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God. I hav told them that a house divided against itself cannot stand. The future would be something awful and dark if it were not for this rock on which I stand.'"

This is with preachers a favorit method of "refuting Infidelity," and these particular references to Jackson, Webster, and Lincoln hav been made probably from every two-for-a cent pulpit in the country. Some years ago Mr. Talmage, a Brooklyn person of some notoriety, rolled them out in his best gymnastic style when he was "answering" Colonel Ingersoll, and that gentleman devoted a few words to their consideration in his "Interviews on Talmage." We cannot do better than quote him:

"I find that he [Mr. Talmage] has the disease that seems to afflict most theologians, and that is, a kind of intellectual toadyism, that uses the names of supposed great men instead of arguments. It is perfectly astonishing to the average preacher that anyone should hav the temerity to differ, on the subject of theology, from Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, and other gentlemen not eminent for piety during their lives, but who, as a rule, expressed their theological opinions a few minutes before dissolution. These ministers are perfectly delighted to hear some great politician, some judge, soldier, or president certify to the truth of the Bible and to the moral character of Jesus Christ.

"Mr. Talmage insists that if a witness is false in one particular, his entire testimony must be thrown away. Daniel Webster was in favor of the fugitiv slave law, and thought it the duty of the North to capture the poor slave-mother. He was willing to stand between a human being and his freedom. He was willing to assist in compelling persons to work without any pay except such marks of the lash as they might receive. Yet this man is brought forward as a witness for the truth of the gospel. If he was false in his testimony as to liberty, what is his affidavit worth as to the value of Christianity? Andrew Jackson was a brave man, a good general, a patriot second to none, an excellent judge of horses, and a brave duelist. I admit that in his old age he relied considerably upon the atonement. I think Jackson was really a very great man, and probably no president impressed himself more deeply upon the American people than the hero of New Orleans, but as a theologian he was, in my judgment, a most decided failure, and his opinion as to the authenticity of the scriptures is of no earthly value. It was a subject upon which he knew probably as little as Mr. Talmage does about modern Infidelity. Thousands of people will quote Jackson in favor of religion, about which he knew nothing, and yet hav no confidence in his political opinions, although he devoted the best part of his life to politics."

In regard to the alleged conversation with Lincoln, it is purely apocryphal. As referred to by Mr. Brown it is all awry, and he had evidently forgotten just what the original lie was. We will tell him. The basis of the story is found in Holland's Life of Lincoln. But Antietam and the Emancipation Proclamation do not figure in it at all. A man by the name of Newton Bateman is responsible for the yarn, and the confession of Lincoln is said to hav been made during the presidential campaign of 1860. Lincoln was then at Springfield, Ill. Mr. Bateman was superintendent of public instruction at the time and a zealous Christian. He was frequently in Mr. Lincoln's room at the state house, and on one of these visits they were canvassing the probabilities of the election, to take place within a few days. Mr. Lincoln had a book in which the intentions as to voting of nearly all the people were recorded. It was found that nearly every clergyman and elder and prominent churchman was against Mr. Lincoln because of his views on religion. After carefully consulting the volume, Mr. Bateman alleges that Mr. Lincoln said:

"'Here are twenty-three ministers, of different denominations, and all of them are against me but three; and here are a great many prominent members of the churches, a very large majority of whom are against me. Mr. Bateman, I am not a Christian—God knows I would be one—but I hav carefully read the Bible, and I do not so understand this book;' and he drew from his bosom a pocket New Testament. 'These men well know,' he continued, 'that I am for freedom in the territories, freedom everywhere as far as the Constitution and laws will permit, and that my opponents are for slavery. They know this, and yet, with this book in their hands, in the light of which human bondage cannot liv a moment, they are going to vote against me. I do not understand it at all.' Here Mr. Lincoln paused—paused for long minutes—his features surcharged with emotion. Then he rose and walked up and down the room in the effort to retain or regain his self-possession. Stopping at last, he said, with a trembling voice and his cheeks wet with tears: 'I know there is a God, and that he hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that his hand is in it. If he has a place for me—and I think he has—I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God.'

"As the two men were about to separate, Mr. Bateman remarked: 'I hav not supposed that you were accustomed to think so much upon this class of subjects. Certainly your friends generally are ignorant of the sentiments you hav expressed to me.' He replied quickly: 'I know they are. I am obliged to appear different to them; but I think more upon these subjects than upon all others, and I hav done so for years; and I am willing that you should know it' (Life of Lincoln, pp. 236-239)."

This disposes of Antietam and the cabinet scene, for the lies do not coördinate. The remark, "I hav told them that a house divided against itself cannot stand," was used as a key-note of his campaign, and supplemented by this: "This government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free." But there is no authority for the sentence about the future being "awful and dark" were it not for the "rock on which I stand." That is pulpit cant added by some unknown liar.

Now as to the statement of Mr. Newton Bateman. Nearly two years ago we published from the industrious and accurate pen of John E. Remsburg a full consideration of the question, Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian? In it Mr. Remsburg brought out all the evidence he had been able to find in a ten years' search on both sides. Of this interview between Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Bateman he said:

"The publication of this story produced a profound sensation among the personal friends of the dead president. It revealed to them the unpleasant fact, assuming Holland's account to be correct, either that Newton Bateman, who had hitherto borne the reputation of being a man of veracity, was an unscrupulous liar, or that Abraham Lincoln, whose reputation for honesty and candor, long anterior to 1860, had become proverbial, was a consummate hypocrit; and loath as they were to believe the former, they rejected with disdain the latter.

"Referring to this story, Lamon, in his 'Life of Lincoln,' says:

"'There is no dealing with Mr. Bateman except by a flat contradiction. Perhaps his memory was treacherous or his imagination led him astray, or, peradventure, he thought a fraud no harm if it gratified the strong desire of the public for proofs of Mr. Lincoln's orthodoxy' (Life of Lincoln, p. 501).

"While Bateman undoubtedly misrepresented Lincoln in his account of their conversation—for it is not denied that he had an interview with Lincoln—it is quite probable that he did not to the extent represented by Holland. Bateman doubtless exaggerated the affair, and Holland magnified Bateman's report of it. In an article originally published in the Index and subsequently quoted by Lamon, Lincoln's law partner, Mr. Herndon, says:

"'I doubt whether Mr. Bateman said in full what is recorded there. I doubt a great deal of it. I know the whole story is untrue—untrue in substance, untrue in fact and spirit. As soon as the [Holland's] "Life of Lincoln" was out, on reading that part here referred to, I instantly sought Mr. Bateman and found him in his office. I spoke to him politely and kindly, and he spoke to me in the same manner. I said substantially to him that Mr. Holland, in order to make Mr. Lincoln a technical Christian, made him a hypocrit; and so his "Life of Lincoln" quite plainly says. I loved Mr. Lincoln, and was mortified, if not angry, to see him made a hypocrit. I cannot now detail what Mr. Bateman said, as it was a private conversation, and I am forbidden to make use of it in public. If some good gentleman can only get the seal of secresy removed I can show what was said and done. On my word, the world may take it for granted that Holland is wrong—that he does not state Mr. Lincoln's views correctly' (Lamon's Life of Lincoln, p. 496).

"In a lecture on 'Lincoln's Religion,' delivered in Springfield in 1874, alluding to the same subject, Mr. Herndon says:

"'My notes of our conversation bear date December 3, 12, and 28, 1865. Our conversations were private, I suppose. However, I can say this much; that Mr. Bateman expressly told me Mr. Lincoln was, in the conversation related in Holland, talking politics and not religion, nor Christianity, nor morals, as such. I hav persistently dogged Mr. Bateman for the privilege of publishing my notes, or to giv me a letter explaining what Mr. Lincoln did say, so that I might make known the facts of the case. Mr. Bateman has as stoutly refused.'

"Dr. Bateman finally permitted Mr. Herndon to make public a letter, marked 'confidential,' which he had written Mr. Herndon in 1867. In this letter Bateman says:

"'He [Lincoln] was applying the principles of moral and religious truth to the duties of the hour, the condition of the country, and the conduct of public men—ministers of the gospel. I had no thought of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, Unitarianism, Trinitarianism, or any other ism, during the whole conversation, and I don't suppose or believe he had.'

"Had Lincoln made the confession he is reported to hav made, this would hav suggested to Mr. Bateman the idea of his admitted orthodoxy as well as his reputed heterodoxy. Had Lincoln declared that 'Christ is God,' this would hav suggested to him the idea of Trinitarianism. It will be seen, even from this letter, that instead of talking theology and professing a belief in Christianity, he was talking politics and denouncing the intolerance and bigotry of Christian ministers.

"Dr. Bateman privately asserts that he was not correctly reported, that Holland's version of the interview 'is colored.' It is to be regretted that he had not the courage to state this fact to the public, and his plea, 'My aversion to publicity in such matters is intense,' is a poor apology for refusing to do so."

Mr. Remsburg goes on at length and conclusivly shows the internal improbabilities of the story, and the internal and external probabilities that Mr. Bateman lied (exaggerated, he calls it) considerably, and that Holland then added the wealth of his literary genius to the tale. That Mr. Holland was capable of doing this is evidenced by the remark he made to one of Lincoln's Springfield friends whom he was interviewing for materials for his Life. On Lincoln's religious views, which Mr. Holland was endeavoring to ascertain, the martyr-president's friend suggested "that the less said the better," meaning that Lincoln had none, or rather that he was opposed to Christianity. Holland was equal to the emergency, and promptly replied, "Oh, never mind, I'll fix that!" "And he did," adds Mr. Remsburg. "With dramatic embellishment he presented to the delight of the orthodox world the now famous, or rather infamous, Bateman interview."

In Cook County, Illinois.

Three years ago E. A. Stevens, as secretary of the American Secular Union, succeeded in restraining the board of county commissioners of Cook county, Ill., in which district Chicago is located, from paying money to the Chicago Industrial School for Girls. His suit was based on the law forbidding appropriations of public funds to sectarian institutions. The place is managed by "sisters," and its board of officers has always been exclusivly Roman Catholic, though the school was organized under state laws. The supreme court held that as the school was in the House of the Good Shepherd and its moneys went in with the moneys of that institution it was conducted on a sectarian basis.

The amount of money saved Cook county by the Union secretary's suit has been over thirty thousand dollars. The managers of the school hav applied to every board of commissioners since, but the order of the court was a rock in their way. To overcome the objection they built a new house for the school and recently made a new application for five hundred and fifty dollars per month. The president of the county board appointed a special commission to find out if the institution was sectarian, and on this commission were two Liberals, Mr. Stauber and General Lieb. The commission found the school to be sectarian, and now the Catholic managers propose to take the case to the court of appeals, in which still sits their friend, Judge Moran. It will be a hard fight, but the evidence is on the right side.

Mr. Stevens began another suit against another Catholic institution, at Feehanville, but it was allowed to drop when he resigned the secretaryship of the Union. Illinois laws against sectarian appropriations are quite sharp, and had this second suit been pushed it is probable the Secular Union would hav won another victory by simply enforcing the laws.

It is time the Union again took hold of practical work. It can do a good deal if it goes about it in the right way.

Editorial Notes.

At the annual meeting of the Washington Secular Union the secretary was instructed to prepare a pamphlet on Sunday laws and Sabbath observance. In the words of the people, what is the matter with John E. Remsburg's "Sabbath Breaking?" It will be a long while before a work more closely crowded with facts, opinions, and arguments than that is prepared by anybody. It covers the ground faithfully and fully.

Professor W. R. Harper, of Boston, appears to hav been studying mythology. Recently he lectured to the Young Men's Christian Association of that place and he incidentally remarked that the story of the Garden of Eden was founud in the traditions of several other ancient peoples besides the Jews. And in every story, he said, there is a woman in the case and also a confounded fool of a man only too willing to be tempted and then mean enough to lay it all to the woman.

William H. Herndon died of the grip Tuesday, March 17th, at his home, near Springfield, Ill., aged seventy-two. He was for many years the law-partner of Abraham Lincoln, and it was not until the latter was elected president that their business relations were severed. He leaves five children. A son, Willie, aged twenty-one, died of pneumonia only a few hours before the father passed away. Mr. Herndon was a contributor to The Truth Seeker, writing upon Lincoln's religious views, and about a year ago he published in two volumes a Life of his former partner, whom he reverenced deeply, and whose good name he always defended against the fanatical churchmen who endeavored to make the world believe that Lincoln was a Christian. His and Lamon's Life of the same great man, and John E. Remsburg's "Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?" which will be published in book form when arranged, completely destroy the claim of the church to Lincoln. For his labors in this matter Mr. Herndon deserves the thanks of all Liberals.

LESLIE, MICH., Feb. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no doubt that our secretary is a fine little lady, but I think she should not be ashamed to be called an Infidel. For my part, I am proud to be styled an Infidel, and I inform everyone that I am proud of it. Was Thomas Paine afraid to be spoken of as an Infidel? Was D. M. Bennett ashamed? Is our Ingersoll ashamed? No, no, not much. The church tries to make us ashamed of the name of Infidel. Let me say to you, sister secretary, when I first came out and said I was not ashamed to be called Infidel I got severely snubbed by the church and by some of my best friends, as I supposed they were. That was six or seven years ago, but I hav stood as firm as a rock. They all know what I believe, and what I think of the churches. And now they really condescend to call on the Infidel; they now say, "I wish everyone was as good as Mrs. Haynes." They are coming around all right.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 291.

I would like to giv a slight account of my religious experience in my youth. I am now past eighty years of age. At about the age of ten years I attended a Methodist meeting. The preacher did his best to paint the tortures of a hell of fire and brimstone, to which the souls of all unbelievers must go after death, to remain there eternally. Every fiber of my boyish nature revolted at the cruelty and injustice of such a God. I felt a bitter antagonism, not to say hatred, toward such a being. Since that time I hav been called an Infidel. Later I searched diligently in science, philosophy, and reason for a God and man's immortal soul, but failed to find either. God is said to possess omnipotence and omniscience, qualities which, to me, seem antagonistic. If he knows man's final destiny, can his omnipotence destroy that knowledge? If it can, he is not omniscient; if it cannot, he is not omnipotent. Has he mortal faculties? Reason implies limited knowledge. Love, anger, hatred, misery, vengeance, imply imperfection and change. Searching for God is like putting clear water in a vessel and setting it on the stove until it is evaporated and nothing is left—that is God. Life to me has not been an unpleasant journey. I hav not been troubled with fear of Gods, demigods, devils, ghosts, fairies, witches, warlocks, or kelpies. Although not aggressiv, I hav never hesitated to express freely my radical unbelief. Much of my enjoyment along the journey of life I attribute to freedom from fear of the supernatural.

I will only add, you are doing a grand work. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the champion of the world for Freethought and sound sense. And Heston is more than a brick; he is a tower of strength and beauty. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contributors.

COALING, ALA., Feb. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In a late TRUTH SEEKER in an article on Spiritology from Mr. Willis, he says some may become clairvoyants and see what others cannot, and others clairaudients, and hear what others cannot. Now, his article has learned me a heap. I went out a few days before to feed my hogs and the wind was pretty high. I commenced calling them, and I could hear them coming. Now I know it was just those spirits, for no hogs came. I also went for my cows and I could hear the bell in every hollow, but when I got there it was somewhere else. Now, it was the spirit of the bell fooling me. Will Mr. Willis explain how a red light is not red to some, and the same of green and white? Will he explain how the Christian sees his savior hanging on the cross and hears that small still voice speaking peace? Now, according to his logic these are verities, as much as his hereafter. Has he never done enough of thinking to know it is constant association and the same environments that makes life what it is? Does he not know that he sees his dead friends just as he last saw them? Twenty years ago I was separated from a friend that was very congenial to me then, and that feeling continued until a few months ago, when that friend visited me and we did not hav a thought in common; I loathed his thoughts. So of the spirits. My father and mother died in their decrepitude. If death does not change a person any more than going from one room to another, will they be that way to me and at the same time young to their parents, over in the other world, or limbo, or whatever it is? If those spirits would just make some useful communications, it might do; but they do not. They could help Walter E. Reid if they would, but they do not. So they are of no use, and all Christians and Spiritualists are monomaniacs without doubt.

Your letters to Holy John are splendid. Keep them up.

H. J. WARD.

RICHMOND, VA., March 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We had our first Liberal lecture here last Wednesday, the 11th, by J. E. Remsburg, the champion of the great apostle of liberty, Thomas Paine. He had a few hearers, not over seventy-five. I will not speak of the able manner in which Mr. Remsburg handled his subject. I am not able to do him justice. But I will say a word of the manner in which the people took it, as viewed from three points, namely, Freethought, orthodoxy, and revenue. The morning paper startled the city by its head-lines thus: "The Infidel Defended." As my name was down as taking a prominent part, my friends, both orthodox and Freethought, hav been calling on me ever since, most to condemn, a few to congratulate. Many of them had had hopes of my one day joining the church and forsaking the paths of vice for the narrow road to glory, but now they say I am lost, forever gone, for being instrumental in having such a cursed lecture in our holy city. A few congratulate me and return thanks. But one of the strangest things of all is that so many Freethinkers were sick the night of the lecture, and they all were attacked with nearly the same disease, and, more strange, they were all well by the next morning. Not one who holds office or is in any way prominent and has Liberal views was at the lecture.

Some hav called to learn where they could get Thomas Paine's works. Others hav consented to read them if I would lend them. Others hav declared they would die before they would read one word of "Tom" Paine. The latter class is not made up of what you would call the ignorant, for some of the first members of the bar are included in it. One good, God-fearing lady yesterday borrowed "Common Sense" and "The Age of Reason" from me under the pretense of wanting to read them. She took them home and burnt them, then told me that while she was doing it she was praying for my deliverance from that awful sin. One minister has announced that he would preach to-day on the heinousness of Infidelity. I am invited to attend church.

Many hav told me I hav injured myself financially by taking part in the lecture. I am now anxious that there be a series of lectures delivered here as soon as practicable. If dates can be arranged to suit, I can secure good houses to any good lecturer; that is, I can secure the best and most proper hall on certain nights of the week, and if such nights can be arranged I will see that it is well advertised.

WILLARD, MICH., March 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Levi Williard passed to a higher life Jan. 9, 1891, of paralysis and typhoid fever. He was born March 24, 1825, at Brimfield, Portage county, O. In November, 1856, he, with his wife—whose maiden name was Sarah Ingraham—their two little boys, and a sister of his wife, moved from Granger, Medina county, O., to Town 15 North, Range 3, East Michigan—a dense forest, which left all laid-out roads, and many other conveniences of civilized life, some miles behind. We found a few settlers in the township south of ours. In passing from that time until now, we hav not space in which to dwell upon the amount of hard labor performed, privations and hardships endured, nor the many lonely hours spent by the settlers, while clearing their land and erecting the necessary buildings in which to shelter their families. As time passed Mr. Williard was ever ready to assist the new settler in various ways, and also was very activ, in fact taking the lead, in the organization of the town (which was named Beaver), school districts, etc. He was particularly interested in the advancement and improvement of schools, and as his sons grew up he gradually left the farm-work mostly in their hands and became activly engaged in the political field, with the interest of the laboring man in view. He was always an outspoken man in expressing his views on any subject. He has taken and read THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last fifteen years; was a great admirer of the pictures, because of the thoughts contained, which speak highly of the ability of Watson Heston. After coming to Michigan six children were added to the family, which made eight, four sons and four daughters, all of whom survive the father except the third son, who passed away two years ago at Fresno, Cal. Two daughters are in North Dakota. The other five liv in Bay county, Mich. The wife and mother, with the two younger children—who are grown up—are still on the same homestead where Mr. Levi Williard placed his small family over thirty-five years ago, which, like Bay county, has since that time very much improved. The sister passed away in the fall of 1879. She was energetic in her labors of usefulness, especially in teaching the young. The funeral services of Mr. Williard were held at the house. Appropriate remarks were made by the Rev. S. H. Roblin, pastor of the Universalist church of Bay City, in the delivery of which he showed a manly independence by varying from the usual service on such occasions, and trying to conform to the wishes, as previously expressed, of him who lay silently before us, thereby proving by his example that as we are not expected to all see alike on certain points, we can extend a brotherly hand, and show sympathy and charity. Our neighbors hav been very kind, for which we would express our thanks.

GAYLORD, KAN., Feb. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 14th I noticed articles by "Veritas," W. L. Willis, and H. H. Philbrick, relating to Spiritology or Spiritualism, and as a light-seeker I respectfully ask permission to state my experience and to ask for more information. I am not an advocate of any particular class, but a new convert to Liberalism, fully comprehending the gross fallacies of the Christian creed and searching for the most reasonable doctrin of Freethinkers. I believe with Feuerbach that "God is the mirror in which man sees himself." But I cannot bring myself to think that this life is the end-all of our intellectual existence. Spiritology claims to afford direct communication with the life after death, to unfold the curtains surrounding the unknown world, and to render what to non-Spiritists is remotely inconceivable, concerning immortality, in a clear light laden with indubitable proof of the reality of a continued existence after we cross the dead line. But do not the phenomena of Spiritology involve something of the material nature? Can a thing immaterial perform tricks it is credited with, such as moving tables, chairs, beds, etc., and actually cause a pencil to write between two slates? If spirits, at our indicating a desire to hav them do so, will aid us in solving a problem, answering a sealed letter, or in doing any one feat which without their aid we should not be able to accomplish, might they also not extricate us from the pit into which we accidentally tumble, release the criminal from his cell, build our houses, dam our streams, or in fact do anything we hav been accustomed to execute by physical labor? Do not understand me to be affirming or denying any question. I ask these queries which through some investigation on the subject hav risen unprovoked.

Two years ago, at the instigation and under the direction of a stanch Spiritualist of our vicinity, six of the neighbors began holding circles. For two weeks there were no manifestations. At the end of that time a lady of the circle seemed to hav feelings that indicated, as the leader said, trance-talking. But nothing came of it more than partial unconsciousness. Sitting one night with the lady referred to, and her husband also a member of the circle, my arm was moved involuntarily and commenced writing, as we thought. On bringing a light we found first the outlines of a revolver. Following this was the name of my control, with a description of his death, which he said was by means of the pistol in the hand of an assassin. The name of the murderer was given, together with the burial-place of the murdered man, also the names and post-office of his brother and father, and a request to go to the place of killing and capture the criminal. Relying fully on the written matter, a young friend and I went to inquire into the case, and, strange to say, found neither grave nor treacherous villain nor anything to corroborate the testimony of my atmospherical visitor. I still courted the impious fraud, my control, and would receive communications when sitting alone, some of which were true but most of which were the most stupendous misrepresentations. Interrogations placed on slates and the substance of them unknown to me would sometimes be intelligently answered, but more frequently the reply would be a collection of meaningless words not pertaining to the query at all. After two months of such proceedings I gave up in disgust, believing that further acquaintance with so unreliable a power could result in gaining no definit evidence.

I am fully aware that by following the rules as given by Mr. Willis the peculiar results described will be obtained. Yet does the evidence indicate human intelligence in spiritual form, or does it not rather show a perplexed state of the material mind? True, things may be done while under this influence which indicate that a subtle and strong power unknown to us is acting in conjunction with us—the problem is solved, the table made to move at our beckoning, and many other wonderful freaks are performed—but may this all not be the workings of some unseen agent, say electricity, and still hav no connection with spirits?

One medium will be made to say that such a condition is true, another declares to the world that something directly the opposit is unimpeachable, and so in the information gathered through mediums relating to a point in question there are frequently as many opinions expressed as there are mediating agents. Moreover, the stories reported by each intervening party will in most cases harmonize with his ideas in natural mood.

Now, is it not possible that divulgences from these minds, almost abnormal by action of this subtle power, which may be strictly temporal, are not from across the dead line, but the particular theory of the individual confounded with the ideas of the others in the circle or immediate vicinity. Hoping to get some one's views on the subject, I am, till then, one in the dark.

ROCHESTER, MICH, Feb. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8 50 for four subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which please forward to the addresses on inclosed blank. It has taken me some time to get the names, but perseverance will overcome large obstacles, you know, and I feel fully rewarded, for I feel satisfied that the little seed thus sown will not fall among thorns.

I also inclose an article clipped from a Detroit paper showing the dire strait into which the clergy and their following are thrown in order to be able to combat the Liberal and Freethinking masses. How long is it since a Catholic priest would not condescend to notice a heretic or Protestant priest? How long is it since they were the bitterest enemies, ready at a moment's notice to burn, behead, or tear each other in pieces in the most approved style? It is but a short time, and now we find them walking arm in arm, occupying the same pulpit, and making a combined effort to keep the faithful in the dark and narrow path. And it will take their combined efforts to keep them there, for superstition and ignorance are slowly fading before the light of such mediums as THE TRUTH SEEKER, Independent Pulpit, etc., and I sincerely hope that their light may never grow dim.

Find inclosed twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for myself.

Yours for liberty of conscience, R. D. WATSON.

FATHER O'BRIEN ON PREJUDICE.

The fact of a Catholic priest occupying a Unitarian pulpit was sufficient to attract a large audience to the Unitarian church last evening, but Rev. Father Frank A. O'Brien, of Kalamazoo, appeared perfectly at ease as he discoursed for an hour on "Prejudice." The principal portion of his remarks were devoted to a defense of Roman Catholicism against the attacks of Protestantism, which, he said, were due entirely to a misunderstanding between Catholics and anti-Catholics. He did not believe a leveling of the differences would make the world Catholic, as he did not believe that would ever be accomplished. He had met Protestants who were laboring under the belief that Catholics were taught that all non-Catholics were on the straight road to hell, and he had invariably found it very difficult to convince them to the contrary. Prejudice against the Catholic church had been created through writers who delight to paint the church with a brush doubly dyed in the gall of bitterness, and to a vast majority of non-Catholics the church is the beast of Revelation, the scarlet woman, an old man on a golden throne with his great toe exposed for good Catholics to kiss.

They believe the pope to be Antichrist, and that the church must obey him implicitly; that he is incapable of sinning, and rejoices in untold wealth; that he directs the politics of the country by an arrangement with Tammany, and is some day coming to America to put to death every one who is not a Catholic. They believe the church traffics in sin by selling permission to commit sin in quantities to suit; its members worship sticks and stones and even old shinbones of dead men; that the Virgin Mary is made a goddess, and we are taught to lie and commit any other sin when the end justifies the means; that priests pretend to forgiv sins; that no Catholic can read the Bible, and no matter what kind of life a man livs, if he can only be oiled before he dies he is all right.

Another fallacy is that young people are forced into convents against their will. Some Protestants will find these ideas overdrawn according to their opinions, but a majority will find some of these phases firmly fixed in their minds as an exact representation of the Catholic church. The feeling against the church is, in a measure, acquired from information furnished by reformed Catholics or persons dismissed from the church. The newspapers, too, seldom giv the Catholic church fair play, and there is a class of papers which eke out an existence by dealing in lies which hav been refuted a thousand times. In looking over a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER he found a list of penances exacted by priests for sins committed, but judging from the prices it must hav been a closing-out sale, viz.: "Swearing, 25 cents; cursing, 15 cents; lying, 50 cents; disobeying parents, 37½ cents; reading the Bible, $1; killing a Protestant, 10 cents."

A Sunday-school book he had recently read compares Mormonism to popery, and says both pander to the lusts of men, as nunneries are but priests' prisons for women. He thought, in the interest of morality, that Sunday-school literature should be more closely scrutinized. The public libraries, he said, contain very few Catholic books. There are two sides to every question, and if the testimony of Catholic historians is not admitted, surely only one side can be known. Catholics are to blame for the existing state of affairs. An ignorant Catholic cannot giv an honest answer to an honest question, yet his mutterings are often taken as authority on Catholic matters, and the bad Catholic, who does not practice what he pretends to believe, brings odium and disgrace on the church. The foreign Catholic is also to blame for a large portion of the prejudice, as he persists in presenting the church in the garb of a foreign nationality. He brings his Sunday-breaking customs with him, by which he not only scandalizes Protestants but good Catholics as well. To such Father O'Brien would say, "Either this country is good enough for you or it is not. If it is, then be true Americans and drop your foreignisms. If it is not, get out of the country as soon as you can, the country would be well rid of you."

Father O'Brien said he had unlimited contempt for the "policy Catholic," whom he described as the meanest of the lot. He denied that the church was responsible for the actions of the many who call themselvs Catholics. He then closed his discourse by telling some of the things which Catholics do not believe. The pope is not believed to be infallible, he said, except in matters of faith and morals. There is no such thing as kissing his great toe; all Catholics are not holy, nor will being a Catholic keep one from going to hell; indulgences are never sold, nor is an indulgence a license to commit sin; a lie cannot be made justifiable; the Virgin Mary is not a god, she is honored only as one highly favored as the savior's mother; priests cannot forgiv sins at will and Catholics are not forbidden to read the Bible, but, on the contrary, popes, bishops, and priests are continually urging their people to read it.

KENT, O., March 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Our society closed a series of meetings February 15th, given as a library benefit, which in point of numbers and financial as well as intellectual profit exceeded the expectations of the most sanguin. This desirable result was chiefly brought about by the good example set by Miss Ada Campbell in giving her service for the opening meeting held in the Opera House, Kent, O. Her subject, "Heredity," drew a large and appreciativ audience. The people, learning that the brilliant Australian was going to donate $10 toward liquidating the debt incurred in adding $51 worth of books to our one-hundred-and-eight-volume library, "caught on," and, emulating the good example set, paid all the expenses of the course, and almost paid off our debt. Had it not been for a blunder in taking the collection at the wrong time we would now hav been out of debt, for numbers of the large audience, tired of waiting for the "passing of the hat," reluctantly left the hall, taking home the shekels started toward our coffers by Miss Campbell's unselfish example.

Not long ago we wrote a distinguished Secularist to get his terms for Sunday lectures. The reply was, $25 per lecture, "because I can get it." Contrast that enthusiasm with that spirit of devotion to liberty which characterized the pioneers and agitators of the antislavery times, notably Stephen Foster, of Massachusetts, who, instead of driving a good bargain with those whose liberties were equally menaced with his, would receive no compensation save the common one, the overthrow of slavery. That spirit actuating a would-be deliverer of the people from church thralldom is a better credential than that crystallized in a paid field secretary, I think.

Inclosed find a copy of a set of resolutions adopted at the one hundred and twenty-sixth meeting of the Kent Secular Society, in memory of a lifelong Secularist, Ambrose C. Hind, who joined the Kent Secular Union June 21, 1885; died Feb. 27, 1891.

To placate certain narrow-viewed sectarians, relativs of the deceased, our local press refuses to publish these tokens of respect to our dead brother. Naturally we look to THE TRUTH SEEKER to right the wrong by giving prominence to the Christian injustice thus sought to be meted out to the voiceless dead. Mr. Hind dared to do his own thinking and to express his honest thought. He believed in and practiced the "religion of this world," Secularism. He could not accept the dogma, "Every doer of the law, every moral worker, is accursed, for he walketh in the presumption of his own righteousness," even though asserted and fathered by Martin Luther, the so-called reformer but heretic of his time. Our late brother accepted the truth for its own sake, as evidenced to his mind, whether found in or out of any Bible. He repudiated the doctrin of Wesley, that the practice of justice and mercy, i.e., simple morality, is nothing before God. He had the manhood to refuse his assent to that infamous dogma as set forth in Luther's "Table Talk," "If one hav faith enough in Christ he may commit adultery and murder a thousand times a day without imperiling his salvation." For his thus being true to himself—the best evidence of a true manhood—certain devotees of a fossilized religion are apparently ashamed, and, like the efforts of the mother church to appropriate the influence of his illustrious name, practicing her worse than idolatrous mummeries over the unconscious body of the hero of the March to the Sea, they would rather hav it appear that the one for whom we and they mourn had died a partisan of some sect, sham, or superstition. Had our late brother been a hypocrit and given a thoughtless assent to the impositions of his time, no shame would hav been felt. But the real shame is, that in this enlightened age such mental serfdom exists and willing slaves uphold the existing tyranny. And the dupe, if his eyes were opened, might easily see that to the Jew the Catholic is a heretic, to the Catholic the Lutheran is, to the Lutheran the Methodist is, to the Methodist the Universalist is a heretic, and so on, or that the heresy of one age is the orthodoxy of the next, consequently they all are heretics in the estimation of the adherents of older superstitions.

As the early Christian church held it a virtue to deceive and lie for the glory of the then new heresy (see Mosheim's History), so now its slaves would bury their dead under the livery of a lie, rather than hav it known that a dear relativ was not a mental slave. Shades of Bruno, Hypatia, Coligny, Paine, Jefferson, Lincoln, and all other heroes or martyrs of the race! your noble examples, so freely given, that the liberty and equality of man might be secured in "the here and now," hav met a poor response from the minds of the unthinking. The religion of believe or be damned is bearing its necessary fruit of intolerance. If our dead brother had been of that faith, which puts blind belief above words and while preparing a hell for the honest doubter at the same time steals Girard's millions to make sectarians, he might hav been a Methodist, a Lutheran, or a Catholic, in short, a Christian, but not a Secularist, hence, as he was a member of a society which has for its cardinal principle the liberation, education, and elevation of mankind, the truth must be suppressed that orthodox appearances at least may prevail. Verily we liv in strange times, among stranger devotees of a strangest superstition, the natural outcome of the Christian dogma, "He who affirms that the gospel requires works for salvation, I say flat and plain he is a liar"—Martin Luther's interpretation of his master's "Believe or be damned."

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

WHEREAS, Under the government of immutable law, our brother A. C. Hind has met death with that fortitude inherent in an upright life; therefore be it

Resolved, That in our brother's untimely decease this country loses a brave defender, one who has proved his patriotism by giving of the best years of his life that the best government on earth might be preserved and perpetuated.

Resolved, That this society, deeply sympathizing with his family in its great bereavement, realizes that Secularism loses a faithful adherent, and the community an exemplary member who knew that there is a philanthropic and medical art of preparing men's eyes for the light as well as their arms for liberty.

Passed at the one hundred and twenty-sixth meeting of the Kent Secular Union, March 1, E.M. 291.

M. H. HEIGHTON, Sec. Kent Secular Union.

BOZEMAN, MONT., Feb. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The time of Liberals no doubt would be more profitably occupied in the discussion of practical methods for the promotion of the objects of the Secular Union, but as the question of Spiritualism seems always up and in order, the temptation to mix in becomes irresistible. I may plead as an apology that it is only, after having read the interminable discussion year in and year out almost forever, about once in five years that my desire to speculate becomes uncontrolable.

To my mind, Spiritualism is a question the solution of which depends solely on proof. The discussion has been prolonged many years without the slightest approach to a solution, and may be continued indefinitly with the same result. Under these considerations, it would seem that we might suspend discussion for a time and devote the interval profitably to proof. I think we may assume that every sane person is desirous of knowing the truth, be it what it may. Also, we may assume that if spirits do exist, in such a form as represents the intelligent principle of man's nature, they are desirous that their friends and relations left behind should know continued existence to be a fact.

Furthermore, I think it will be conceded by all that all of the proofs so far hav failed to be in proportion to the magnitude of the question seeking a solution; that while comparativly few hav received evidence satisfactory to themselvs, the great mass of mankind hav not been reached. Now, it would seem that, admitting these two assumptions to be true, there will be no necessity of violating any of the conditions demanded by Spiritualism in furnishing the required proof.

I am a stickler for conditions myself. Nothing that exists can for a moment be exempt from conditions. Therefore I frankly concede that if spirits do exist, they are entitled to all the conditional considerations of a God or of anything else.

We will further concede that it is only through legitimate, definit, and prescribed channels that it is possible for them to communicate. This is one of our own necessities, and I can see no impropriety in conceding the same to spirits. It is within these conditions, iron-bound as you please, that we respectfully ask for proof, and see nothing irrational in so doing.

Neither do we make the request in a spirit to be construed in the light that we do not think it can be done. We only ask that mediums lend a hand by constituting themselvs the channels through which the spirits may operate. If spirit is synonymous with intelligence, and, as we may rationally assume, wishes its existence known to the inhabitants of the earth, and if mediums are inspired with a similar wish, one important condition is as good as already fulfilled. If spirits do communicate through human mediumship, conveying intelligence to man, why has not the Spiritualist a predication upon which to base a demonstration equal to that of the electrician?

The trouble has been that the proofs, however good they may hav been, hav been confined within circles entirely too small. To convince a few favored individuals in a little circle is to ignore the world. Why should not the many doubt, when we may reasonably conjecture that were the claims of Spiritualism true the earth itself would be literally flooded with spirit communications? If in common occurrence, for instance, persons everywhere indiscriminately were receiving messages from departed friends through mediums of whom they had never heard, every message bearing evidence of authenticity and explainable on no other hypothesis than that it came from the personality designated, would it not constitute a body of proof almost, if not quite, incontrovertible, or at least far more effectiv than any as yet produced? It is not surprising that there are so many sound-minded people unconvinced of spirit existence, when they know, or may rationally assume, that all this proof could, or inevitably would, be forthcoming were the claims of Spiritualism true. Especially is it so when we consider the fact that it could all be accomplished within the conditions demanded. Not only this, but the mediums would become famous—the most important personages on earth. Honors would be heaped upon them by everybody, irrespectiv of rank or class. Every religion would melt away before their advance, and instead of contumely they would receive the approbation of all mankind. The emoluments would be no less than the honors bestowed by a grateful world. The most ignoble of men would cheerfully part with their means to receive authentic intelligence from departed relativs and friends.

Then, may we not reasonably ask why the proof does not come? Common sense, reason, and humanity demand a fair and unequivocal answer. Why should a medium advertise for patronage? Do not spirits know their own? Or do they forget the name and post-office address of their relativs and friends? Why cannot a spirit indicate its presence to a medium, signify its desire to write, dictate a communication, also the directions on an envelope, to a friend unknown to the medium? Suppose mankind had for a long time been receiving messages of this character, what most likely would hav been, or would be, their attitude toward Spiritualism to-day?

Now, if it appear that this line of proof is both reasonable and possible, and that it has been deliberately and absolutely ignored by Spiritualism, what must be the reasonable inference? Evidently it is the sort of proof we might naturally expect. The answer, I think, will suggest itself.

Viewed from still another point of observation, we find almost as much cause for doubt. But to dwell upon the result of such observation would be merely to repeat that which has already been written by others; so I shall only intimate that the fact that spirits might oftentimes render valuable service to humanity by conveying intelligence of a mundane character obtainable in no other way, and persist in not doing so, can hav no other tendency than to create additional doubt. And I think we may reasonably infer that, like the God myth, they are not even abreast of the times, and that perhaps there is no more room for them in the universe than for him. However, to my mind it seems but fair to admit a difference in the nature of proof necessary to prove the existence of God and that necessary to prove the existence of spirits. The latter are human at best, and may lack power of self-demonstration, whereas with the former no proof is possible unless from himself. Each argument to prove his existence refutes not only itself, but every other argument adduced for a like purpose. The fact that men feel themselvs called upon to prove his existence furnishes a strong negativ proof that he does not exist. Did he exist, no necessity of proof would exist. The fact would be universally known. It is absurd to assume a being so extravagantly omnipotent that he lacks the power to furnish tangible evidence of his own existence. To concede this is to commit a sacrifice beyond all power of reparation. Yet the stickler is driven unconsciously into it at the expense either of the power or of the existence of his God.

With spirits, however, we will forbear. We will not ask as much of them as of a God. They are only finite at best. We will only ask them to do that which it is fair to assume they can do. Is it not barely possible that some stray spirit is watching over me as I write this article with ample power to communicate its contents through a medium to the world? If so, what is to hinder us from instituting, as a beginning, a systematic method of proof which may ultimately convince the world? Suppose we organize a circle which will embrace the United States. Let the circle be formed by THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Ironclad Age, Freethought, the Independent Pulpit, and the Investigator joining hands. Of course, everybody else and his family will be in the circle. Then let persons, designated or otherwise, write communications to some of the papers in the circle, to be reproduced by spirits and published simultaneously in the other papers. The accomplishment of this by spirits will not be difficult, I should think—no more so, at least, than spirit materialization. Besides, everybody can derive a benefit. This plan will hav the hitherto unknown merit of reaching the millions, and no conditions be violated. THOS. BURK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

What of Thy Life?

What of thy life, O friend of mine?
I do not ask thy creed,
Or whether plant of grace divine
In thy heart scatters seed.

The form of faith that fills thy want
I do not care to know;
Nor whether at baptismal font
Christ's love to thee did flow.

How oft it is you fast and pray
Alone on bended knee,
Or by what chart you shape your way
You need not tell to me.

But tell me if the inborn good
Stands forth in bold relief,
If virtue ne'er misunderstood.
Of jewels all is chief.

And dost thou own from hour to hour
Truth's ministrations sweet;
And does her matchless, living power
Make all thy life complete?

Are all thy days so thickly strown
With good and loving deeds,
That, making others' cares thine own,
Thou hast forgot thy needs?

Hast thou no quarrel with thy friend,
Nor strife or bitterness?
Dost see in all much to commend,
And much to prize and bless?

Dost keep the peace with all mankind,
Knowing no shame or fear?
Striving in every act to find
Thy conscience sweet and clear?

In all thy ways hast thou e'er done
The best thy hand could do?
If so, I'm sure thy crown is won,
Fadeless and pure and true.

As conduct is from day to day—
This is the test of man;
The inside life, the outside way,
Conformed to nature's plan.

Who makes his rule of life by this,
Must walk with angels here;
On earth must liv in peace and bliss,
With Love's evangels near. S. H. W.

Didn't Like the Sermon.

There is a familiar story about how Daniel Webster, when he was practicing law in New Hampshire, loftily denounced a quotation from a text-book made by a rival attorney as absurd and untenable, upon which the opposing lawyer quietly explained that the passage so contemptuously treated had been introduced into the volume from one of Lord Mansfield's decisions, that great jurist's exact language being preserved. The following anecdote about a famous old character in Whitley county, Ky., has much the same flavor. Joshua Barnett was a wag and a religious orator and possessed a prodigious memory. The Jelico News tells the story:

"Uncle Josh, as he was generally called, had an appointment to preach one Sunday at an out-of-the-way log school-house in his neighborhood, and two noted lights of a rival denomination attended the meeting for the purpose of criticising the sermon. One was named Jones, the other Warman. Uncle Josh, who, it appears, was aware of their intentions, concluded to checkmate them, and instead of preaching a sermon he commenced repeating from memory and without any comment whatever one of the epistles of St. Paul. For nearly an hour chapter after chapter fell from his lips accompanied by a grave and decorous gesture and intonation. Brother Jones at the end of some thirty minutes arose with grave disapproval written all over his face and retired from the house, and took a seat in the yard upon a barkless and prostrate tree, which was used as a horse-block. Brother Warman stood it some ten minutes longer, when he too arose and joined Brother Jones. 'Well, Brother Warman, what do you think of such a sermon?' said Brother Jones. 'Think?' said Brother Warman, 'why, I think if the good Lord will forgiv me this time for listening to such rotten doctrin I will never be guilty again.'"

A "Beautiful Story" by a Little Girl.

A little girl, aged three, informed her mother that she knew a beautiful story about a giant. "Would you like to hear it, mamma?" asked she.

"Well, then," she continued, "once there was a great, big, ugly giant, and he was very fond of eating little girls. One day as he was walking along through the woods he met two little girls—one very good little girl and one very naughty one.

"First he took a bite out of the good little girl, and he made up a horrible face, and said she tasted awful nasty. Then he took a taste of the bad little girl, and he smacked his lips and said she tasted dreadful nice, 'cause, you see, mamma, she had eaten nuts and raisins and candy when her mother told her not to, and that made her taste sweet. Then the old giant said: 'I'll never again eat a good little girl. I'll always eat the bad ones."

A Lesson on the Use of Words.

Don't say: He will be apt to catch cold, but liable to catch cold. The difference in the two words may be thus illustrated: "A very studious boy is apt to learn, but liable to hav a headache now and then."

Don't say: I am not used to those sort of things, but that sort of things.

Don't say: That will prevent him going, but that will prevent his going.

Chats with Correspondents.

ELEANOR K.—The Beacon is published in San Francisco, Cal., by Sigismund Danielewicz. It is an organ of Anarchists. The Chicago Liberal is a bright and breezy monthly published and edited by Mrs. M. A. Freeman at the low price of twenty-five cents per year. The story "Evicted," now running through its columns, is very interesting.

JOHNNY.—It is better not to retaliate. Be brave, however, and hold up your side against all odds. They cannot kill you for being an unbeliever.

Correspondents will please be patient. The letters are all here, and there is a large number waiting to be printed. They will appear in due time.—ED. C. C.

Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 25, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to the Children's Corner, and as I hav a few minutes to spare, I thought I would write you a few lines. I was ten years old on December 26th. I am in the ninth grade B, and must study hard to keep up with the rest of the boys. On Sunday evenings I go with my parents and sisters to the Liberal League. I do not understand very much, but I do understand Mr. Letterer more than any other speaker, because he talks plainer than any of the rest. As it is getting late I will close. Yours truly, EMIL SCHULZE.

QUINCY, O., Feb. 24, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is my first letter for the Corner, I will tell you that I am fourteen years old and go to school. We all love our teacher; we think she is splendid. I study the Sixth Reader, history, arithmetic, spelling, geography, grammar, physiology, hygiene, and writing. I love to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially the Corner. I think it is very kind in you to notice us little folks, and giv us so much good advice. We do not go to church, and hav no use for preachers or priests. Hoping to see this in print. I remain,

Your little Freethinker friend,
SALLIE R. ARGABRIGHT.

LYONS, KAN., Feb. 29, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Dear Madam: I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner to-night. I attend a district school about a mile from here. The weather has been very severe on account of sudden changes, for which Kansas is noted. In regard to church attendance, I cannot say that I ever attended but twice, to my knowledge, in fourteen years. My mother and father are both profound Infidels. We hav a library full of books of all kinds, including Paine's "Age of Reason," and many others of that order. I hav your "Story Hour" and think it a superior book of its kind. For fear of making my letter too long I will close. Wishing you success in the good work you are in,

Yours truly, RALPH BUTLER.

[Let us hear from you again, Ralph, and often.—ED. C. C.]

SHERMAN, MICH., March 9, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I hav written two letters before to the Corner and will endeavor to write again. History is my favorit study. What do the Cornerites say to having a history class in the Corner? What I propose is this: The little Cornerites are to write to the Corner and ask history questions of one another and answer questions asked by others. Now you hav heard it, what do you think of it?

I think it would be instructiv as well as amusing.

I am the only Freethinker among the scholars attending the school I go to, but am not ashamed of it. I am really proud of being one.

Up here in northern Michigan we are having plenty of snow and cold weather. Well, my letter is getting rather long, so I will close. With best wishes, I am,

Your Freethinker friend,
M. AURORA SOUTHWICK.

P.S.—What does Miss Wixon think of what I propose? M. A. S.

[The proposition above stated is a good one. Send along the questions and answers. —ED. C. C.]

DALEVILLE, IND., Feb. 24, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I come to the Corner again, if you will permit me.

It has been quite a while since I wrote to you, but I hav not left off reading the Children's Corner. That is what I look for next to the pictures.

I am desirous of information and would like to ask a few questions, but do not wish to tax your patience.

I always had an idea in my mind that one could not believe anything unless one understood it.

In the beginning God created the earth, and started it, I suppose, just as he desired.

All at once the devil appeared on the scene and everything changed.

If he had not, there would not hav been so much trouble about this tariff question, for there would not hav been any woolen manufactories, for we would not hav needed any clothing.

Now, why did not the devil leave things alone when they were right in the first place? It seems as if he is bound to be ahead.

Now, they say there is only one devil. Well, how can he be in so many things at once? Oh, they say, it is his imps. Well, let us see. Are these imps in bodily form no spirit (evil spirit)? Well, how many spirits has one being? One, I think. It is puzzling to me and I would be too glad for some one to explain, so I could believe.

We hav had quite a revival in the Christian church here, and several things happened there that I could not understand. Their minister was one of the leading member's sons, and of good standing in the church, as far as I know. But he said you must love the Lord and fear him. How can we love a thing and fear it at the same time?

And, too, he said of our friends that only those that loved the Lord and feared him were our friends.

He said that the more riches a man had the more responsibility he had toward God. Well, they are now taking up collections to hire him as their minister. Why does he not preach for nothing? He has plenty to liv on; besides that, he does not practice what he preaches.

One more thing: Is the heaven space? Ofttimes we hear a remark something similar to this, "As the stars shine in the heaven." Are not the stars in space just the same as our own planet?

Will some one explain to me, for I am not very well educated, why Mr. Soomaker said that the more knowledge and education we had the more responsibility we had toward God.

Cousin George, let us hear from you. I would like to say more, but am afraid this will go to the waste-basket. I will close with best wishes for the Corner and its leader.

Your friend, SALLIE REMSBURG.

[Ask the minister to explain, Sallie, and let us hear what he says.—ED. C. C.]

PORT-OF SPAIN, TRINIDAD, WEST INDIES,
Jan. 23, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Perhaps you may think that I am dormant and the interest usually manifested in the Corner has gone, as it is quite a while that I hav not contributed something. I am so very busy at this time of the year that really I scarcely get time to do anything outside of my business.

At the same time I must really say that my interest in the Corner has increased tenfold, particularly as I now perceive a greater number of Cornerites are making themselvs known by sending in their letters and essays, and I sincerely wish that they will continue and contribute oftener. I generally, in my leisure hours, read with much interest the letters which appear in the Corner, especially those of my friend and correspondent, George J. Remsburg, and the essays of Miss Stockinger. In fact, the efforts of all your pupils—if I may so call them, ourselvs, as I include myself in the list of Cornerites, although being a big boy, twenty-three my last birthday.

As I am at it, I may as well giv a brief description of this place.

Trinidad is an island situated to the eastward of Venezuela, from which it is separated by only a channel; is between 10 deg. 3 min., and 10 deg. 50 min. north latitude, and 61 deg. 39 min., and 62 deg. west longitude from Greenwich. It was discovered by Christopher Columbus, when on his third voyage on the 31st of July, 1498. He was surprised, says Washington Irving, at the verdure and fertility of the country, having expected to find it more parched and steril as he approached the equator; whereas he beheld groves of palm-trees and luxuriant forests sweeping down to the seaside, with fountains and running streams beneath the shade The shore was low and uninhabited, but the country rose in the interior and was cultivated in many places, and enlivened by hamlets and scattered habitations. In a word, the softness and purity of the climate, and the verdure, freshness, and sweetness of the country, appeared to equal the delights of early spring in the beautiful province of Valencia in Spain.

He found the island peopled by a race of Indians with fairer complexions than any he had hitherto seen—"people all of good stature, well made, and of very graceful bearing, with much and smooth hair." They hav all, without exception, emigrated and disappeared. Trinidad well deserved the name which its Indian inhabitants had bestowed upon it—Iëre, the land of humming-birds.

The area of Trinidad is 1,754 square miles and contains nearly 200,000 inhabitants, representing people from all climes and countries. The physical aspect is that of a comparativly level country, none of its mountains possessing the towering grandeur of the lofty peaks which distinguish some of the smaller West India islands. The valleys and plains are watered by large rivers, and the mountain ranges are everywhere deeply indented with ravines and deep gorges, through most of which flow more or less abundant streams of water. There cannot be a doubt that the island owes much of its richness and fertility to these streams, which, flowing through the valleys, cover them with never-failing verdure and beauty.

Among the products are sugar cane, cacao, cocoanuts, tobacco, limes, plantains, yams, sweet potatoes, and all tropical fruits and vegetables.

With these few lines I beg to close, wishing the Corner success and yourself health.

Yours fraternally, EM. DOS SANTOS.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. OR,
The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

HOW TO PRESERVE HEALTH.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

CONTENTS:

The Prevention of Disease—Hygiene of Different Organs—Age and Occupation—The Dwelling—The Care of the Sick—Nursing—The Family Physician—How to Giv Aid in Emergencies—Contagious and Miasmatic Diseases—Diseases of the Nervous System—Altered Nutrition—The Respiratory and Digestiv and Urinary Tracts—The Skin—Parasites—Motherhood.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College, N. Y., says: "I regard your book, 'How to Preserve Health,' as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav ever met. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family and in the library of every school, for I think it would popularize a vast amount of important and useful knowledge, and thus be of great service to the community. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it; that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging, which our anxious grandmothers and others lacking the requisit elementary knowledge are too prone to indulge in, and oftentimes do great harm thereby. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

John B. Hamilton, M.D., Surgeon-General of the Navy, and Professor of Surgery, Georgetown University: "I thank you for the excellent book, 'How to Preserve Health.' I hav no doubt of the necessity of such books, and yours is of such merit that it will surely be successful."

Samuel Sherwell, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Skin, Brooklyn: "Your excellent treatise, entitled 'How to Preserve Health,' appears to me admirably adapted for the reading of the laity, correcting as it does a large number of false impressions that prevail among them. The direct suggestions, as in remarks on the skin, are of decided value."

THE

French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparative oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail to receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

CANCER and Tumors CURED: no knife: book free. Drs. GRATIGNY & DIX, No. 163 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

DONALD KENNEDY of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Price $1.50. News of the Week.

THE proposed law requiring a signature to every newspaper article is opposed as restrictiv of the liberty of the press.

THE New York senate has enacted that all police justices be selected from lawyers, which is a delicate way of arranging that New York city justices—Tammany Catholics—be able to read and write.

THE grip prevails again.

GEN. JOE JOHNSON died on the 21st.

LAWRENCE BARRETT died on the 20th.

PRINCE JEROME BONAPARTE died on the 17th.

WICHITA, Comanche, and Kechi Indians hav resumed ghost-dancing.

THE Farmers' Alliance has as yet secured no legislation in Kansas or any other state.

THE Catskill, N. Y., jail holds two clergymen—Rev. Louis Woodruff, embezzler, and Rev. Harry George, seducer.

THREE children of Daniel Doan, Springfield, Ia., hav died under ministrations of two female Christian Science healers, who hav fled.

A HACKENSACK, N. J., school meeting, on the 17 h, dismissed Vice-principal Stone for saying "hell" before pupils. Rev. John Voorhis was elected a trustee.

MISS SUSIE GILBERT, a Birmingham, Conn., school-teacher, made her pupils doff shamrocks and green ribbons on St. Patrick's day, and her dismissal is demanded by parents.

CARDINAL JACOBINI at the St. Patrick's day banquet at Rome praised the religious propaganda of the Irish through the world. "God," he said, "is acting through the Irish people."

To a protest of German Protestants against the Catholic chief chaplain of the army being ranked in court precedence before the Protestant, the press organ of the emperor replies: "They meddle with what is in no way a matter of concern to them, and the government does not feel in the least disposed to alter its etiquet to please these good gentlemen."

REV. DR. BLAND said at the last weekly meeting of the Methodist Ministers' Association of Chicago, in debate on the New Orleans tragedy, that there are circumstances in which lynching is justifiable. "I wish," said he, "a hundred thousand leading citizens in this city would rise up and put an end to some of the law-breaking that is going on here—Sabbath desecration and Sunday saloons."

PRESIDENT MCGRATH of the Kansas Farmers' Alliance says that the Alliance in the future will depend more on business management than on politics. "Through our organization," says he, "we are in a position to know where every bushel of marketable grain in the four states is to be found. When there is a rise in the market we will only sell enough grain to satisfy the demand, and thus prevent the speculators from getting control. We will fix a price which will giv us a fair profit and only sell at that price."

INTEREST is directed to the painting being finished by the German artist Max Horn, of "Columbus before the Council of Salamanca." Columbus, a forlorn and disappointed man, has his rapt gaze seemingly endeavoring to pierce futurity and his arms stretched after some imaginary elusiv object. There is a provoking smile on the face of the fat monk in front. Another, pressing a Bible to his breast, wears a smile of contemptuous pity. An elderly bearded monk is touching his forehead with two fingers, as if to emphasize the general estimate of the visionary.

ITALIANS both at home and in this land continue indignant at the New Orleans lynching. Some of them say that they forbore sending gunboats to the Mississippi only because of former friendliness with this nation. They are holding indignation meetings in our cities, and demand the trial of the lynchers at Washington. Secretary Blaine awaits answer from the governor of Louisiana. Judge Marr, of New Orleans, has charged the grand jury to investigate. Italy may be offered indemnity. Parkinson, leader of the lynchers, has received what purports to be a Mafia warning, but is not alarmed, as the slightest injury to him would cause the wiping out of about all the Italians in the i y

THE past has no claim to infallibility any more than the present.—Stubbs's Constitutional History.

How strange and sad is the laxity with which men, in these days, suffer the most inconsistent opinions to lie jumbled lazily together in their minds!—Coleridge.

HUMAN thought has grown; science has increased; men think more and believe less; men hav found that the moral doctrins of Jesus meant moral suicide; the affairs of this world engage their attention, instead of the affairs of the next—in a word, so-called Christianity has changed into Rationalism, while still retaining the old name.—*Arthur B. WHO spreads knowledge dispenses alms to the ignorant; and who possesses it, attains the veneration and good-will of all. Knowledge enables its possessor to distinguish what is forbidden from what is not; . . . it is our friend in the desert, our society in solitude; our companion when far away from our homes; it guides us to happiness; it sustains us in misery; it raises us in the estimation of friends; it serves us as an armor against our enemies.—Mohammed

WHAT do you think endures?
Do you think a great city endures?
Or a teeming manufacturing state? or a prepared constitution? or the best built steamships?
Or hotels of granit and iron? or any chef-d'œuvres of engineering, forts, armaments? . . .

The place where a great city stands is not the place of stretched wharves, docks, manufactures, deposits of produce merely,
Nor the place of ceaseless salutes of newcomers or the anchor-lifters of the departing,
Nor the place of the tallest and costliest buildings or shops selling goods from the rest of the earth,
Nor the place of the best libraries and schools, nor the place where money is plentiest,
Nor the place of the most numerous population.

Where the city stands with the brawniest breed of orators and bards,
Where the city stands that is beloved by these, and loves them in return and understands them,
Where no monuments exist to heroes but in the common words and deeds,
Where thrift is in its place, and prudence is in its place,
Where the men and women think lightly of the laws,
Where the slave ceases, and the master of slaves ceases,
Where the populace rise at once against the never-ending audacity of elected persons,
Where fierce men and women pour forth as the sea to the whistle of death pours its sweeping and unript waves,
Where outside authority enters always after the precedence of inside authority,
Where the citizen is always the head and ideal, and president, mayor, governor and what not, are agents for pay,
Where children are taught to be laws to themselvs, and to depend on themselvs,
Where equanimity is illustrated in affairs,
Where speculations on the soul are encouraged,
Where women walk in public processions in the streets the same as the men,
Where they enter the public assembly and take places the same as the men;
Where the city of the faithfulest friends stands,
Where the city of the cleanliness of the sexes stands,
Where the city of the healthiest fathers stands,
Where the city of the best-bodied mothers stands,
There the great city stands.

FATHER TIME CUTTING DOWN RUBBISH.

Notes and Clippings.

A FRENCH law has just been enacted, limiting the hours of labor for women and children during the day and forbidding their working by night. This law imposes on all industries the obligation to giv one day of rest in seven to women and children. The amendment proposed requiring that that day of rest should be Sunday was voted down, but doubtless Sunday will be the day chosen by the employers.

"WE don't want any Catholic party in this country. American sense of justice will produce the only party we require on that score in the United States."—The Catholic Union and Times. Just so; the Roman Catholics are too sharp at present to advocate a "Catholic party," especially as long as they can hold the balance of power in the great political parties. But we warn them to quit meddling with the political parties, by which they are securing to themselvs large sums of the people's money and other state patronage. They must put a full stop to this system of robbery, otherwise there will be an anti-Catholic party formed in this country, to the grief of Romanists.—American Baptist.

SEVERAL cases of clerical bigotry and intolerance hav recently disgraced the Established Church of England. The vicar of a Devonshire charge declined on a recent Sunday to proceed with the service till a lady member of the choir had left the church; the only ground alleged for this extraordinary act was that the lady had attended a mission service at a Wesleyan chapel. Another case is that where the rector of Barmouth refused permission to allow a lady, a member of the Welsh Calvinist Methodist church, to be buried in the same grave as her late husband. The third instance is perhaps the most deplorable of all. The fact that Rev. H. Marriott, a clergyman licensed as a preacher in the diocese of Exeter, had been attending services at a Baptist chapel, was reported to the bishop. The bishop wrote a letter of inquiry to Mr. Marriott, who replied that, in his endeavor to obey the divine command, he thankfully united with all branches of evangelical worship. The episcopal reply to this very laudable confession was a prompt demand that Mr. Marriott should resign his license to preach in the diocese.

THE Paris correspondent of the London Times writes: Opponents of the separation of church and state in France hav frequently declaimed against the absence of ceremonial pomp in civil marriages. They pointed with pride to the splendor, or at least the stateliness, with which the Roman, Jewish, and even Protestant rites surrounded hymeneal unions, and they scouted as absurd and grotesque the efforts of M. le Maire and his acolytes to make official weddings successful from an esthetic point of view. The laugh has now been turned against the church people by the Freethinkers and Iconoclasts, for an imposing marriage service has been performed in the mayor's office of the Third Ward or Temple district of Paris, the civil ceremony taking place to the sounds of appropriate music. The grand or central staircase of the Mairie was ornamented with shrubs and flowers. There was a gorgeous usher, who did duty for a Bumble, and preceded the bridal procession to the Salle des Fêtes, a real organ pealing forth the while the jubilant strains of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March." A rich carpet which was laid down along the part of the floor to be traversed by the bride, bridegroom, and their friends must also be noticed, as well as the lights which glimmered over the scene. The nuptial knot was tied in the Salle des Fêtes, the entry of M. le Maire, girt with his tricolor sash of office, being duly heralded in imposing tones by an usher. A brief hymeneal homily was then addressed to the happy pair by the municipal functionary; a madrigal and a serenade were played by an orchestra, while the demoiselles and garçons d'honneur made a collection for the poor as in church. The wedding being concluded, the organist once more set to work and evolved from his pipes the coronation march from Meyerbeer's "Prophète."

AT the trial of Carey Warburton for smashing the Bougereau painting, this hypothetical question was put: "Suppose the case of a young man about the age of the defendant, who, when a boy, was fond of solitude; who frequently talked on the subject of religion and contemplated entering the ministry; who one time wrote a letter to his uncle, then his guardian, on the subject of religion, for the purpose of converting the uncle to his own views on that subject; who expressed himself as being an enthusiast on the subject of religion, as his father was said to hav been; the trend of whose mind is toward religious subjects; who, for more than a year past, has been in the habit of talking a great deal on the subject of woman's purity, at times being considerably agitated when discussing such subjects; whose mind dwells on such subjects with more or less constancy for about half his time, but who has had lucid intervals during the last year aggregating about one-half the time, but who, even while his mind is dwelling upon the subjects named, was able to do and attend to business; who, in December last, on being brought in close personal contact with an oil painting of a nude, life-sized woman with a number of cupids about her, on exhibition in an art gallery, in the presence of a number of persons, seized a chair and hurled it against and through the painting and who immediately set the chair upon the floor, coolly walked away, saying he did the act for the protection of woman's virtue; whose grandfather for a time seemed not to know anybody or anything, and while in that state occasionally put a Bible on a stand, saying, 'We are going to hav a prayer meeting soon; Christ is now out in the field husking corn;' whose father would occasionally in railway cars, standing upon one of the seats therein upon his knees, read extracts from Swedenborgian literature and deliver exhortations thereon to persons present in the cars, who once loaned a book on the subject of Swedenborgianism to a neighbor to read it, and would himself go and get it once or twice a day, and who was killed by shooting himself with a revolver; an uncle of whom was known to preach a sermon in the forenoon and steal a horse in the afternoon; and state whether in your opinion the young man described in the question is or is not sane." The jury disagreed.

Liberalism and Mysticism.

Ostensibly the object of the Liberal organization is to secure from the federal, state, and territorial governments the concession of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. These Demands, as the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are all aware, require the taxation of church property, the repeal of all Sunday laws and blasphemy laws, etc., intending thereby to completely secularize the state.

Yet there is perhaps not a reader of this paper who does not intuitivly recognize that these Nine Demands are not sufficiently comprehensiv to constitute a working basis for the American Secular Union; that, in fact, they do not express the actuating principles of the organization nor its evident purpose. To secure the recognition of these Nine Demands by the ordinary methods of political reform is clearly hopeless, for it is an evident fact that the reform embodied in the Nine Demands can be procured only when a sufficient number of the people hav been sufficiently emancipated from the direct and indirect influence of the church, and the Jesuitical practices of the church hav been met and foiled. Take, for example, the taxing of church property. It is useless to reason with the Christian portion of the population that in exempting church property from taxation an unjust tax is thereby imposed upon non-Christian taxpayers, who are thus compelled to support private corporations to whose principles and purposes they are diametrically opposed; for in so doing we merely appeal to the Christian's sense of honor and justice, which is the very quality that in the Christian is conspicuously absent. In the history of centuries what instance hav we of the Christian church dealing generously, justly, or honorably with her opponents? The foundation dogmas of Christianity are the very acme of injustice, and their vitiating effect is shown too clearly in the Jesuitical craftiness, hypocrisy, and intolerance of the devotees of that faith.

In its real work the Liberal organization is the avowed combatant of Christianity, and in making the Nine Demands it merely throws down the gauntlet. Now, while entirely in sympathy with the objects of the Liberals, it seems to me that the society is too limited in its scope, having no proper conception of the real nature of religion, and no adequate estimate of the power wielded by the church. It is commonly held that man has evolved from lower forms of life, and that in progressing from the savage to the civilized state he has created the baseless superstitions of religion. According to this theory the present is an era of greater knowledge and civilization than any that hav preceded it. Now, the stubborn facts of history and philology directly oppose this supposition. As far back in history as man can be traced he was as perfect as he is now. The languages of savage peoples are all the corrupted forms of nobler language, and savages, instead of moving upward to civilization, are moving downward to inevitable extinction. The most perfect language, and, in fact, the only scientific one, on earth is the oldest of all known languages, Sanskrit. Tracing the origin of Christianity, we find it was stolen from the Greek and Jewish religions, and that these had come from the religion of Egypt, which in turn had been derived from Aryavarta, or ancient India. Turning, then, to ancient India, we find a language so marvelously perfect that Attic Greek is poor in comparison with it, a language embodying the science of sound, and upon which the whole of modern philology is based. It is, in fact, the key to all other languages, even to the English. Its extant literature is so voluminous that a lifetime is too short for its perusal, and it comprises poetry, philosophy, mathematics, etc., which reveal a higher state of civilization than we hav at this time. Greek, Latin, and modern languages contain nothing that will compare for grandeur, splendor, and depth with the philosophy of the Sanskrit. Here, then, is the original source of all systems of religion and philosophy, sciences, and arts; where Homer drank inspiration, where the Arabians obtained their mathematics and engineering;* the Chaldeans and Egyptians their astronomy; Hermes, Pythagoras, Plato, and Ammonius Saccas † their philosophy; and here we find a key not merely to the origin and true meaning of religion but also to the secret mystic doctrins underlying every religion, taught only to the initiated few and never to the multitude. Here we find that religion, instead of being the mere growth of superstition in the minds of savages, taken advantage of by a self-constituted priestcraft, is in fact but the lingering and degraded memory of the science of the ancient world, and that evolution, instead of being a straight line of progress, travels in cycles, like the earth itself in its cyclic path around the sun, having its days and nights, its winters and summers. And according to the Hindûs, humanity has been in its dark age since 3102 B C.

Underlying the apparent absurdities of all religious myths are real truths, but of all Christian denominations the Catholic alone has retained anything like the real meanings of the symbols and myths they hav preserved. In every case the true meaning is concealed, yet in the Sanskrit Vedas, Uparrishads, the Bhagavat-Gîtâ or Song Celestial; in the magic incantations on the clay tablets of Chaldea; in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, Sphinx, and pyramids; in the Jewish Talmud and the Kabala; in the book of Job (which is an Egyptian and not a Hebrew work); in the Apocalypse of St. John; in the parables and sayings of Jesus; in the veiled writings of Pythagoras, of Plato, of the Neo-Platonists and Gnostics, of Paracelsus and the other fire-worshipers of Germany, are traces of the science of the ancients —a science which began where our modern science stops baffled and despairing. The priests and magicians of old possessed a knowledge of forces in nature and powers in man wholly unknown to modern science. To illustrate this: Among the fragments preserved of Egyptian art is a picture of a large Anubis standing beside a sick man stretched upon a couch, and in the act of making passes over him, with one hand raised above his head and the other placed upon his breast, showing that what we call mesmeric or magnetic healing was known to the ancient Egyptians. The clay tablets unearthed at Nineveh show that the Chaldeans also understood this art perfectly. Yet it is only of late that the fact of mesmerism has been admitted by our modern scientists. Indeed, our scientists had hardly stopped laughing at the superstitions of witchcraft, magic, and sorcery when mesmerism and that mesmeric process technically termed hypnotism became proved facts, and several European countries hav already passed laws against employing hypnotism for evil purposes. One can learn more concerning magnetism from Pataujali's Yoga Aphorisms, an old Sanskrit work, than from all the modern books on mesmerism ever published. Again, the Spiritualists are aware of certain phenomena out of the ordinary run of nature, showing the action of forces unknown to modern science. The phenomena of Spiritualism marked a certain point in a minor cycle of evolution, now about closed. Such a cyclic termination is mentioned even in the Bible (vide Joel ii, 28, et seq).

The dabblers in "magic" are already many in this country, and during the coming years much evil will surely be done by them, through "mesmerism," which is the key to what is commonly called "magic." "There are several remarkable cycles that come to a close at the end of this century. First, the 5,000 years of the Kaliyug cycle [the 'dark age' of the Hindûs, the 'iron age' of the Greek occultists]; again, the messianic cycle of the Samaritan (also Kabalistic) Jews of the man connected with Pices (Ichthys or 'Fisherman,' Pag.). It is a cycle historic and not very long, but very occult, lasting about 2,155 solar years, but having a true significance only when computed by lunar months. It occurred 2410 and 255 B C., or when the equinox entered into the sign of the Ram, and again into that of the Pices. When it enters, in a few years, the sign of Aquarius, psychologists will hav some extra work to do, and the psychic idiosyncrasies of humanity will enter on a great change" (Mme. Blavatsky, Esoteric Character of the Gospels).

Observe that I am not attempting to throw any light upon what the secret science of the mystics is, for I would not do so if I could. I desire only to suggest that religions are derived from ancient science, which partially explains the hold they hav upon mankind, and which they would not hav if they were the mere outgrowth of savage minds; that the priesthood hav a thorough knowledge of the weaknesses of human nature, and skilfully mold their church services, rituals, ceremonies, etc., so as to take advantage of the weaknesses; and that the order of Jesuits retains a knowledge of the subtle forces of nature employed in magic, and by which they wield a greater influence over humanity than would be deemed possible by anyone who has never investigated such forces; and that such organizations as the Liberal League hav not examined sufficiently into the real nature of religion, and are therefore engaged in fighting a foe of whose real strength and secret resources they hav not even dreamed.

Of late years considerable interest has been aroused in mystic literature, and the works of the mystics from Plato to Robert Fludd hav been largely studied, and from the mere surface meaning of these works all sorts of absurd systems hav grown up, of which perhaps the shallowest and craziest is the "mind cure," or, as it is also called, "Esoteric Christianity," "Christian Science," etc. Now, as a matter of fact, every mystic book ever written, from the earliest Sanskrit works to the writings of Mme. H. P. Blavatsky, is so written as to conceal its real meaning from everyone who has not the secret key, and to one who has caught even the faintest glimpse of this hidden meaning nothing could be more absurd than the theories extracted from such books by the Christian Science people.

However, to those who hav never pursued the subject of mysticism, it may be interesting to briefly consider one of the maxims of the mystics, "Man is the microcosm of the macrocosm"—that is, man is a miniature of the universe. Remember that our modern scientists regard all forces as "modes of motion" or "vibration." Light, heat, sound, etc., are wave-vibrations. Also that the scientists are tending to the belief that matter and force are ultimately identical. Now, just as every religion has its trinity, so has Modern Science, namely, matter, force, causation, and Modern Science inclines to the belief that these three are one. Is it not clear that the dogmatic statement of the religious trinity in unity is a degenerate statement of an ancient scientific fact? Let us call this trinity matter, force, and the universal mind.

According to the mystics, the universe, though eternal, has its periods of waking and sleeping, or of manifestation and unmanifestation, or in Sanskrit Manvantara and Pralaya. Imagin, if it be possible, the universe during Pralaya, or repose; no suns, worlds, or manifested life. The Greeks called it chaos, the depth, the abysm; the Hindû mystics called it Mula-prakriti; in all religions it is the immaculate virgin—Isis of the Egyptians, Diana and Venus of the Greeks and Romans, Mary of the Catholics, a word also signifying the sea; modern science would call it undifferentiated cosmic matter. In the universal mind the idea of the universe slumbers. The period for manifestation comes, and the sacred word (the "Logos," the "Christ," vide John i, 1–6) goes forth from the universal mind; it is the Verbum, the Vach, the creativ vibration, force, the second member of the trinity, and setting in motion the cosmic matter it establishes centers of energy, suns and their systems.

In the astral light the seer perceives whirling spots of light, from mere dots to great globes. They are centers of energy—so-called "elementals," and are semi-intelligent when highly developed—"gnomes," "fairies," "nymphs," etc., when they attain to forms. Such centers of force in the macrocosm are suns, from which emanate all life and force in the solar systems. What is commonly called the "soul" of man is such a center of energy in the astral light, and constitutes the "elemental self," the animal or "carnal" man. The vibration that created it is the "Christ principle," and the eternal idea in the universal mind is the immortal spirit, the true self, the "father which art in heaven."

Man before the evolution of his physical body was a sphere in motion, according to esoteric philosophy. Plato describes primitiv man as a globe; the Egyptians represented him as a winged globe, the "scarabeus" or winged beetle. The center of this sphere is the heart, where there is a spot of light (just as shown in the Catholic pictures of Christ). From this center proceeded the evolution of the physical body, or rather, at first the magnetic or astral or psychic or soul body (spoken of by St. Paul), and then, by progressiv materialization, the physical body. The astral form is the pattern for the physical, and has sometimes been vaguely cognized by those having an arm or leg amputated.

As the universe (the macrocosm) has its periods of manifestation and unmanifestation, so has man (the microcosm); he swings like a pendulum between the objectiv and the subjectiv, "earth" and "heaven." Physical death is the end of the swing in the objectiv; the physical body dies and the magnetic body, and then astral sphere, is dissolved into the "soul of the world" or astral light, and the ego exists in the subjectiv state. Naught of the late individual can survive the dissolution save that which by reason of its pure nature is drawn into and becomes assimilated with the Christ principle (the higher ego) and this is the foundation of the vicarious atonement, so degraded by its dead-letter interpretation. Again the ego swings back to the objectiv, forming anew the astral sphere and the physical body, and thus another incarnation is accomplished.

Man, being a trinity of: the idea from the universal mind, the magnetic sphere, and the physical body, and being the product of all the forces of the universe, is called the microcosm of the macrocosm. Again, as his magnetic sphere is but an individualization of the one substance of the universe from which it is not severed, it is also asserted by the mystics that the microcosm and the macrocosm are one. "Man is therefore the quintessence of all the elements, and a son of the universe, or a copy in miniature of its soul, and everything that exists or takes place in the universe, exists or may take place in the constitution of man. The congeries of forces and essences making up the constitution of what we call man, is the same as the congeries of forces and powers that on an infinitly larger scale is called the universe, and everything in the universe reflects itself in man, and may come to his consciousness; and this circumstance enables a man who knows himself to know the universe and to perceive not only that which exists invisibly in the universe, but to foresee and prophesy future events. On this intimate relationship between the universe and man depends the harmony by which the infinit becomes intimately connected with the finite, the immeasurably great with the small. It is the golden chain of Homer, or the Platonic ring" (Paracelsus).

* The so-called "Arabic" notation is derived from the Sanskrit, the Sanskrit being almost the same as those we use in the present day. Arabic is written from right to left, but in ancient Arabic manuscripts the figures are written from left to right as in the Sanskrit, showing clearly that they were borrowed from the latter. Engineering is called hindi in all Arabic languages, and so of all Arabic words relating to mathematics.

† Pythagoras is recorded by the Greeks as having visited India. He is mentioned in Sanskrit writings as Yaranachara, the Greek teacher. Ammonius's disciple, Plotinus, also went to India with the Roman emperor Gordian. The philosophy of Pythagoras, Plato, and Ammonius is identical with that of the Vedantins and Buddhists.

The descent of spirit into matter and its return is told allegorically in the parable of the prodigal son, who takes his portion, goes to a far country, and finally returns, enriched with experience, to the mystic "house of the father." Taken as a literal story, as it is by the Christians, the parable is immoral, but this hidden meaning lies beyond the scope of theology. Similar concealed meanings are in all the parables, for, as stated in the Bible, Jesus taught openly to his disciples, but spoke in parables to the multitudes, explaining the parables to his disciples afterward. His death would seem to indicate that even he "cast pearls before swine" too liberally.

"In every mythos there is a logos," said the Greeks; that is, in every myth there is a meaning. It is useless to ignore this. By devoting themselvs to the study of these meanings Liberals will make better progress in ridding the world of dogmatic religion than by ridiculing the sublime mythology of the ancients as the fairy tales of semi-savages.

As to the "Esoteric Christians" who hav so terribly mangled the surface meanings of mystic books, I dread them more than the "exoteric Christians" who are content with the dead "letter that killeth."

In combating dogmatic religions let us constantly keep in mind that no bitterness against individuals should ever enter our hearts. Considering each individual as a unit of consciousness in the universe, an immortal idea of the universal mind, passing through the great cycle of existence, let us aid each other toward the light, not blaming others who are blinder than ourselvs, for nature knows we are all blind enough. We are truly prodigal sons, and the husks upon which the swine feed are not particularly palatable even to Christians who pretend a great relish for them. We are all of us—Christians, Freethinkers, Spiritualists, and Materialists—prisoned in the house of Mahamaya, the great Illusionist; and while I hav no creed or system of belief to urge upon anyone, allow me to suggest that much of the great mystery of life and death may be rendered clear by an earnest and thorough study of ancient science and philosophy; and that, in the words of its profoundest modern expositor (Madam H. P. Blavatsky, "Origin of Evil"): "The reasonableness of conscious existence can be proved by the study of the primeval—now esoteric—philosophy. And it says there is neither death nor life, for both are illusions; being (or be-ness) is the only reality. This paradox was repeated thousands of ages later by one of the greatest physiologists that ever lived. 'Life is Death,' said Claude Bernard. The organism livs because its parts are ever dying. The survival of the fittest is surely based on this truism. The life of the superior whole requires the death of the inferior, the death of the parts depending on and being subservient to it. And as life is death, so death is life, and the whole great cycle of lives form but One Existence—the worst day of which is on our planet. He who knows will make the best of it. For there is a dawn for every being, when once freed from illusion and ignorance by Knowledge; and he will at last proclaim in truth and all consciousness to Mahamaya:

> "Broken my house is, and the ridge-pole split!
> Delusion fashioned it!
> Safe pass I thence—deliverance to obtain."

The Women Are Advancing.

Only a few years ago, women, wives, and daughters in New Jersey were the property of the husband and father. To-day, what is the position of women in this state? They are no longer property; but they stand on the broad platform of republican equality with the opposit sex, except in two or three respects. They now are allowed to go to the ballot-box and vote for the election of certain officers. Here, in the Oranges, women turned out by the hundreds to vote at the elections of school commissioners. In the near future women will appear at municipal, town, and state elections, all saddled and bridled and armed for the contest, holding in their business-like grasp

> A weapon that comes down as still
> As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
> Yet executes a freeman's will,
> As lightning does the will of God;
> Nor from its force shall bars and locks
> Prevent them—'tis the ballot-box.

"Behold what Christianity has done for the elevation of women," bigoted Christians exclaim. There never was a blacker and wickeder falsehood. Christianity has not done so much as to lift one's little finger for the elevation and improvement of women. Christianity, and all the Protestant clergy, would hav kept women forever and ever in servil subjection and cruel subordination. Christianity says that "a woman's province is home and to bear children." So said old St. Paul, the accepted exponent of Christianity. Read what this old celibate has written in his Epistles of the Corinthians: "I suffer not a woman to speak. It is a shame for a woman to speak in the church. If she would know anything, let her inquire of her [wooden-headed] husband at home."

Only a few years ago, in the Presbyterian church, in which I was an honored deacon, an excellent woman, prompted by the exuberance of love to God and love to men, arose to tell of her cheering experience. Before she had uttered one sentence the domineering parson arose and, in a commanding tone of voice, said: "Sit down, Mrs. Corwin! You are not allowed to speak here!" I well recollect the first time that the subject of a female prayer-meeting was introduced. The clergy, and the officers of the church, all said that could never be allowed unless the pastor, or a deacon, could be present to lead the exercises and to see that they did everything decently and in order, and did not gossip and fall out and pull each other's hair and spit in each other's faces. I know about all these facts. The wife of a near neighbor was accustomed to read a chapter in the Bible daily at her own home and pray to God. The Protestant clergy thought that was not allowable. But they did not see how the grave impropriety could be obviated. So they all concluded that they would hav to bow in meek submission to the inexorable fiat of him who doeth all things for his own glory.

The illustrious Jonathan Edwards, a zealous exponent of Presbyterianism, was one of my maternal ancestors. I used to think he was one of the greatest men that ever lived. But now I do not cherish his memory nor hold his writings in respectful estimation. He had six beautiful daughters, all of attractiv form and symmetry, and all of whom were not less than six feet in stature. To show how obedient his wife and daughters were, the fact has been handed down by tradition, that when the great exponent of Presbyterianism entered the apartment where any or all of them were engaged in any employment, they all rose and stood in silence until their liege lord waved his monarchical hand for them to be seated. (His biographer refused to publish an account of such an impressiv exhibition of the efforts of modern Christianity to elevate women from a domestic condition of menial slaves and social serfdom.) "Oh, see! Lo! Behold what Christianity has done for the elevation of women!"

Only a few years ago, in the far-famed city of churches—Brooklyn, L. I., contiguous to New York city—the Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler allowed a woman to talk (not to preach) in his church, concerning the love of God. Well, what was the harm or impropriety in allowing a well-educated female to talk to her sisters on the great theme of love to God and love to man? Why, the whole clergy rose up in a rage; and they hauled Brother Cuyler up before a terrifying tribunal and affrighted the timid divine in a terrible manner. Sleep departed from his languid eyes, and his knees became weak as water, at the forbidding contemplation of the outlook that the doors of the paradise of heaven were to be closed forever against him for allowing a woman to speak in his church, in palpable violation of the command of St. Paul and in bold defiance of the regulations of the Presbyterian church. I cannot suppress a hearty laugh at the contemplation of Brother Cuyler. When he began to hear the roaring flames and to smell brimstone, he fell on his knees and begged for mercy and promised, "by all that is in heaven above or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, that he never would allow another woman to open her mouth in his parish." That is the way Christianity has elevated women. Whenever one attempted to rise in the scale of being, the stentorian voice of every sky-pilot and subordinate official would be heard: "Sit down! Put her out! Women are not allowed to speak nor to teach!" But women hav broken the ecclesiastical yoke of serfdom and hav cast it off in spite of Christianity. The irresistible force of environments, the amazing evolution of free thought, free speech, and a free press, the unfoldings of the mysterious webs in the universe of matter, the opening of boundless fields of scientific thought and philosophic investigation (and not Christianity), hav given to woman an immortal soul (which primitiv Christianity denied her). The cheering triumphs of mind over matter all hav aided women to rise to a free, independent, and glorious womanhood.

Now, a few bed-rock facts will suffice. Only a few years ago wives were bought and sold for money in New Jersey or bartered for merchandise. I hav in mind two instances in which the husbands sold each his wife; one for the paltry sum of $10. But the Revised Statutes of New Jersey, now in force, recognize the rights of woman, married or single, to possess property, to buy and sell, to sue at law and be sued in any court, to draw her own documents and plead her own case and make her own arguments, whether she has a husband or not. Bigots who could not keep women longer in the capacity of menial slaves now clap their hands and exclaim: "See what Christianity has done for oppressed and downtrodden woman!" Immortal truth says: "Behold what Freethought and science hav accomplished!"

> As chainless waves majestic roll
> When tempests sweep the sea,
> So, with a high and boundless soul,
> She is, and will be, free.

Exemption from Taxation.

ATTENTION OF THE CITY COUNCIL CALLED TO THE CONSTITUTION.

EDITOR PRESS-TIMES: At a meeting of the house of delegates March 12th the corporation counsel submitted an opinion upon the petition of the House of the Good Shepherd for an exemption from taxation.

The opinion holds that the property is not exempted by law, but that the city council may exempt the same if they so choose.

The attention of the city council is respectfully called to the provision of our state constitution, Art. i, Sec. 2: "No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

Has the city council a right to giv the public money outright to a religious or ecclesiastical body, to a missionary or tract society, or to a church?

Is there any difference between releasing one from a debt of $10—which he is bound to pay—and giving him $10?

Is there any difference between paying out money from the public treasury and remitting taxes that would otherwise come into the public treasury?

To compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves is sinful and tyrannical. Be it therefore enacted by the general assembly that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever.—Thomas Jefferson, in general assembly of Virginia, 1785.

The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community.—President Garfield to Congress, June 22, 1874.

I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to $87,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1870 it was $354,483,587. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. The accumulation of so vast a property as here alluded to without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of property equally.—General Grant's Message, 1875.

When a religion is good, I conceive that it will support itself. When it cannot support itself, and God does not take care to support it, so its professors are obliged to call for help from the civil power, it is a sign, I apprehend, of its being a bad one.—Benjamin Franklin, Oct. 9, 1780.

Let right and justice prevail. Surely religionists should set the example of sustaining the laws of the state. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. W. S. U.

[In the letters to the board of aldermen, and the house of delegates, I added:]

"It is quite impossible that it should be any source of trouble or anxiety, either to the church, or the sisters of the House of the Good Shepherd, to raise the necessary amount to pay their honest dues; since they each and all hav such abounding faith in the blessed promises."

And the Lord said: If you had faith like unto a grain of mustard-seed you might say to this mulberry tree, Be thou rooted up, and be thou transplanted into the sea: and it would obey you.—Douay Bible, Luke xvii, 6.

Ask and it shall be given you: seek and you shall find.—Douay Bible, Matt. vii, 7.

If the prayer of faith can only receive answer when personal exertion is put forth, because the Lord works by means, then the attention of the good sisters is respectfully called to the method prescribed by Christ, as the most proper and truly Christian way to raise money to pay taxes.

But that we may not scandalize them, go to the sea, and cast in hook: and that fish which shall come first up, take: and when thou hast opened its mouth, thou shalt find a stater: take that and giv it to them for me and thee.—Douay Bible, Matt. xvii, 26.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Attention, Auxiliaries!

The corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union appeals to you for your help in forming a closer organization than at present exists between yourselvs and the parent society whose charter you hold. If state secularization is ever to become anything much more than empty talk, it is absolutely necessary that Secularists throughout the United States be welded together into one body.

What is the state of matters now? Some Freethought society somewhere decides to become auxiliary to the American Secular Union, sends on its five dollars charter fee, receives in return its charter, sundry pamphlets for missionary work, and a letter of suggestions from the secretary of the national society. This is the beginning; and this, alas! is almost always the end. In vain may the secretary entreat that such auxiliaries keep up the communication with the national society; in vain may she beg for monthly reports of the work done along the lines of state secularization; in vain may she remind them that the national society has a right to expect such auxiliaries to aid it by financial contributions, or by activ missionary work, or by both. Indeed, as to financial aid, the following list of those societies which hav contributed since I became corresponding secretary will show the state of the case better than will a column of argument:

Nov., 1889, Linesville, Pa., Liberal League, through Wm J Davis	$ 25 00
Dec. 21, 1889, Newark, N. J, Liberal League, through A Pionnie	10 00
Jan. 21, 1890, Locust Dale, Pa., Secular Union, through Carl Neumann, president	5 00
June 27, 1890, Golden, Ia., Ethical Secular Society, through R N Howe	4 06
Sept. 28, 1890, Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, in response to personal appeal by Ida C. Craddock	12 35
Nov. 1, 1890, Golden, Ia., Ethical Secular Society, through R N. Howe	5 00
Nov. 3 1890. Elizur Wright Secular Society of Alliance, O., through R G. Smith	5 00
Nov. 3 1890, Portsmouth, O., Secular Union, through J. L. Treuthart and W. S. Andres	500 00
Jan. 11, 1891, Newark, N. J., Liberal League, for lecture by Ida Craddock, on "How to Make Freethinkers of the Young"	12 25 of which $500 was given by the Portsmouth Secular Union. Of the other societies, it will be seen that two—the Newark Liberal League and the Golden Ethical Secular Society—hav contributed twice.
Total	$578 60

That is to say, in the course of one year and five months, out of all our auxiliary societies through the length and breadth of our country, only seven hav stepped forward to aid the national society by contributions.

But, it will be said, the other auxiliaries are too poor to contribute. We do not believe this; in fact, we know to the contrary, in some cases. But where they cannot giv money contributions, they can at least do missionary work for state secularization; and they can report the work done. In fact, it is for this that their charter has been given to them. How many societies hav been heard from since the Portsmouth Congress regarding work done or attempted? Exactly three—the Boston Ingersoll Secular Society, the Portsmouth, O., Secular Union, and the Albion, Ida., Secular Union. A few others hav scattered along at intervals through my first year's correspondence; but they were few and far between—so few, that it would hardly pay to collate them from our letter files.

My brethren, these things ought not so to be. We ought to be organized on some sort of a systematic plan; there ought to be regular monthly or quarterly reports sent in to the office of the national society; and, wherever possible, there ought to be a small contribution levied on every activ member of an auxiliary, to help along the work of the national society. Suppose that every member of a Secular Union, when the plate was passed around on the American Secular Union contribution day—say once in three months—put in five cents, think what a help it would be to the American Secular Union work! There are few of us who could not afford that sum once in three months. To collect that five cents by individual letters from this office would, of course, be out of the question. But it would be a comparativly easy thing for the officers of an auxiliary to collect those donations from their members when the regular American Secular Union "day" comes around, and to forward the total to the national society.

Do you know how the American Secular Union is supported at present? By voluntary contributions, at irregular intervals, mostly from a few wealthy and generous Freethinkers. A few smaller contributions come in from time to time to eke out the funds; but the greater part is furnished by perhaps six or eight wealthy men. From month to month, the financial existence of the American Secular Union hangs by a thread. Four different months, indeed, hav seen a deficit in the treasury; and only the generosity of two or three individuals tided us over at those times. And yet the records show that our finances are in a better condition now than formerly, when we used to be months and months behind; so that we ought to hav some hope for the future.

But fancy a "national" society which is not supported financially by the majority of those whom it represents!

Something must certainly be done by the great body of the Liberals, if they care to help on the cause of state secularization for which this society works; and that something must be done in a systematic, business-like way. It is high time that we got out of the old two penny, pottering rut of talkee-talkee, and did some practical work. We ought to hav auxiliaries so well organized, and in such constant communication with this office, that all we should hav to do would be to press a button, as it were, and the response would be immediate in any given locality, against any given infringement of the rights of a Freethinker.

See what the early Methodists accomplished with their class-meeting system, and the penny-a-week contributions which it was made a regular custom for each member to giv! They hav become to-day the wealthiest Protestant denomination, simply by not despising the day of small things. See how the papal church thrives by help of the Peter's pence from Ireland and elsewhere! And yet the Irish, in the main, are a great deal poorer than even the poorest of Americans. If these ignorant, down-trodden, priest-ridden people can do so much to uphold superstition, shall not Liberals do as much, or more, to uphold freedom of thought?

But not alone in money contribution should your aid be given to the national society whose charter you hold; it should be given in persistent, faithful missionary work in your own community. It is too often the case that a Secular Union is composed entirely, or almost entirely, of men. The women—your mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, sweethearts, and friends—should be urged to take a hand. You should hav music at all your meetings. Every Secular Union should be the nucleus for a Liberal Sunday-school, and also a Liberal lyceum for the young people in their teens. More by work among the young, than by any other means, will you build up such a Freethought society as will approve itself to the indifferent public—that public whom you will hav to win over before state secularization becomes an accomplished fact. If your people are Atheists, Atheism should be taught in your Sunday-school; if you are Unitarians, teach Unitarianism; if you are Spiritualists, teach Spiritualism; if you are Theosophists, teach Theosophy. All roads lead to truth at last; and it is the extreme of bigotry to insist that all our fellows shall walk along only our special road, even though we feel quite sure that ours is the most direct of all. If all these isms are represented in your society, they should also be represented in your Sunday-school, and the children taught to choose among them for themselvs. I owe the foundations of my own Radicalism to the fact that, as a child, I was allowed to sit and listen to the grown-up folks debating on religious matters, and I was thus early accustomed to seeing that there might be more than one side to a theological statement. But remember above everything, whatever the special ism you teach, to see to it that the young people are imbued with a passionate desire for freedom of thought, for other people as well as for themselvs; and see to it that they realize the necessity for demanding state secularization, and for joining hands with the American Secular Union, which is working for such secularization.

These things—the grown-up people's lecture and debate, the Freethought Sunday-school, and the young people's lyceum—even if begun on a very, very small scale, will assure the permanency of your society more than any one of the three separately will. But whatever line of work you follow, please let us hav a regular report, either monthly or quarterly.

I make this appeal through the newspapers, because I want to be sure of reaching all our auxiliaries. The list of auxiliaries handed me upon my entrance to this office, although a great help, seems to be incomplete. In many cases I can get no answer to the letters which I hav addressed to the societies there given. In other cases the auxiliary seems to be dying down, but would evidently rekindle with a little judicious fanning of its zeal. From time to time, as I can find a spare half hour in the midst of the regular office correspondence, I am trying to reach our auxiliaries. But if I seem to hav overlooked any to whose notice this article comes, I trust that they will pardon me for it, and not cherish any resentment for an oversight which has been unavoidable. We are getting matters gradually systematized; and I trust that each auxiliary will come forward promptly upon seeing this notice and open up communication with this office, so that we may know just who and what are our auxiliaries, what their strength, and what work they are able to do in their community.

I would ask that the officials of each local society consider the suggestion of five-cent contributions from every member once in three months for the national society. In cases where the society is too small and struggling to afford this amount from each member, perhaps the proposal of a penny contribution will bring out a cheerful response. This contribution should be levied, in order to make a prompt start, at once, to be counted for the beginning of April. Then the 1st of July ought to bring in another; and the 1st of October another.

Let us hav a grand rally of our auxiliaries, one and all. Send in your five cent contributions and your monthly reports; and let it be as soon as possible, please. And so I close as I began, in two words which I hope the Editor will hav put into quite big type, so that they will stand out clearly to your eyes:

ATTENTION, AUXILIARIES!

IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Philadelphia, March 27, 1891.

To the Liberal Lecturer.

By a resolution of the board of directors of the American Secular Union on Dec. 7, 1889, it was unanimously voted to offer to each Liberal lecturer half of the charter fee for any auxiliary which he might organize. Thus, if the charter fee is $5, we will return him $2 50; if it is $10, we will return him $5. We think this a much better plan than the old way of "donations to lecturers," when an activ worker for the society frequently did not receive anywhere nearly as much as he was worth to the society. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and we think it but fair that a lecturer should receive a certain per cent of what he brings into the society, where he acts as a sort of traveling organizer and missionary for the American Secular Union.

It is the Liberal lecturers, then, whose attention we would especially call to the above resolution, and invite them to do what they can to increase the membership of the American Secular Union, to spread its principles, and to secure contributions to the treasury. The said resolution, as will be seen, is of long standing, having been passed on Dec. 7 1889; but I take this opportunity of calling public attention to it, as it seems not to be generally known.

I would also respectfully call your attention to the article directly preceding this, entitled: "Attention, Auxiliaries," in which I suggest certain principles to be carried out by the local societies; and would ask that you urge upon all auxiliaries the furtherance of these matters.

Trusting that you will do much effectiv work for the American Secular Union as missionaries for state secularization and as organizers of local auxiliaries, I am,

Yours very truly, IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Philadelphia, Pa., March 30, 1891.

The Badge Pin.

Mr. Wettstein writes: "Please send your note on badge-pin to THE TRUTH SEEKER." Now, in place of sending my note, allow me to say this: I think Mr. Wettstein's Freethought badge is fine, magnificent. Mrs. Green and myself both wore them, and we are proud of them, and I wish every Freethinker in the United States had one. I also think that the one invented by Miss Churchill was very pretty and appropriate, and that the Liberals ought to erect a monument over her grave with that pin engraved upon it. She was a noble, brave woman, and very energetic for a woman who was confined to her bed for fifteen or more years. Her sister, who survives her, has the pin for sale, and I wish she could sell five thousand of them, as the pin is well worth the money and the sister is in destitute circumstances. Her address is West Richfield, O. I hav not seen Miss Ida C. Craddock's new badge, but the picture of it representing the pansy is most beautiful, and I hope she may be able to dispose of ten thousand of them. Now, if anyone else desires to get up a different pattern from all these, let him or her do so and stand the chance of getting a sale for it. Competition is the life of business, and then, as Freethinkers as a matter of course do not think alike, or look alike, let each wear a different badge-pin if desired; but for the sake of the cause we all love do not let us dispute and quarrel over this question of a symbol of our faith like a lot of foolish children. I am sorry to say Freethinkers are too much inclined to each desire their own way and all too apt to condemn those who differ with them. We hav a powerful, well-organized enemy in the Christian church to meet, and we need all the energy and fighting power we hav to contend with that enemy, and should waste none of it in conflicts among ourselvs. For the last fifteen years our domestic contentions hav done us great injury, and now that the foolish rupture in the Secular Union has been for the time compromised and settled, do not, for truth's sake, hatch up another dispute over so small a thing as a badge pin.

H. L GREEN.

More on the Same Subject.

Having been asked my opinion as to the desirability or appropriateness of the pansy as a Freethinkers' emblem, I would say that I regret the discussion has commenced with such acridity. I very much admire the pansy as a flower, but cannot see wherein it symbolizes anything of the Demands we desire. If pensée means thought, that in nowise designates Free-thought. It is just now a very fashionable flower for feminin adornment, and we would be apt to make a great mistake if we concluded that the numerous wearers had the remotest idea that it means thought, much less that it represents Freethought. It lacks distinctiv significance. If in time the pansy were sufficiently ostracised by the Christians and we could feel pretty sure every wearer was a pronounced Radical, then I would as soon hav the pansy as any other flower. Just as the white, red, and blue ribbons hav become expressiv of certain movements without any special inherent significance in themselvs, the pansy might be adopted with success if we had a large following. But the scattered, isolated Freethinkers are so few that it would be a very remote possibility, in my judgment, to secure for it the distinctiv character required.

Being the fortunate possessor of that magnificent Wettstein badge, long recognized as the emblem of the American Secular Union—and certainly it would be hard to imagin anything more appropriate—I feel reluctant to forego it. All may not be able to secure such a suitable emblem, but that is no good reason to take something that has no more distinctiv Freethought character than the pretty pansy.

Hood, of sarsaparilla fame, long ago discovered the subtle beauties and hidden significance of the pansy, and like all men who know a good thing when they see it, has scattered millions of pansies all over this country. Might not the badge-wearers be mistaken for patent medicin agents? If the American Secular Union adopted the pansy for the extension of its business, may not it be in danger of a damage suit for infringement on an advertising trade-mark of sarsaparilla, whose prior adoption could easily be proven? Then, if damages were awarded, can we calmly contemplate the possibility of their collecting them? Yes, there appears some risk to run even in wearing the pretty pansy. Beware!

Mr. Wanamaker's Awkward Position.

FRIEND MACDONALD: You hav now got Postmaster Wanamaker in a trap—a trap of his own setting. It is the same the churches of Massachusetts used to catch witches and Quakers in two or three hundred years ago. Wanamaker took it to catch Infidels in but has caught himself, and if you perform your duty wisely and resolutely, when you get through with him you will hav done more to kill the fraudulent and filthy Bible and the one hundred and forty different sects that hav been founded on it in this nation, than all that has been done in the last fifty years. I am glad you call on him each week to answer your questions about the Bible. Keep on until you get a reply. There is only one way for him to get out of his trap honorably, and that is to confess that the Bible is an obscene, man-made book not fit to be read in schools or families, stop its passage through the mails, then liberate Harman, Heywood, Reid, and other victims that he has entrapped from prisons, bonds, and fines, pay them for the time and money he has caused them to spend, and stop tampering with the mails. If he will do all this he may gain some respect in the world; if he does not do it he will go down to his grave in infamy and his name will be coupled with those that hanged witches, and bored the tongues of Quakers with red-hot irons and hanged them on Boston common for no other offense than telling needful truth.

Go on; stir him up every week; giv him no rest till he decides to do justice.

Injudicious Lies.

A Dr. Hammond has been for some weeks expounding the gospel and "converting" sinners in this Christian city. I hav read in the city papers from time to time of the wonderful utterances of this man. They hav the flavor of falsehood, and the wonder is that a man can thrive on such weak and silly lies. I clip the following from the Post of this morning, March 27th:

Last night Dr. Hammond preached a sermon which was regarded by many as one of the most forcible he has yet delivered. He related a story of an Infidel who lived near Utica, N. Y., who had a beautiful farm, part of which was sown in wheat. One morning a neighbor was passing the field and remarked to the Infidel farmer, "Your wheat bids fair for a good crop." "Yes," said the man in return, "I shall hav a good crop if God almighty will let it alone." The stalk and blade grew and the ear seemed to be well filled. Then the same golden hue was to be seen upon the fields of golden grain. At the time of harvest the man engaged harvesters to cut and gather in the grain. On entering the field they examined the ears but could find no wheat, and, after cutting a swath through the center of the field and down one side, on a full examination there was not a grain of wheat to be found in the whole field.

Deacon Ford, now of Viola, Ill., vouched for the truthfulness of the story.

There were several conversions last night and many gave their experiences. There will be a children's meeting at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and regular services at 7:30 to-night.

"Deacon Ford" vouches for Dr. Hammond, but who will vouch for the deacon? If there was one grain of truth in this silly story Dr. Hammond would giv names and dates. Several "conversions" followed the narration of the story. If they believed the story they were already converted. Wonder if the "Infidel farmer" was "converted." It is now in order to hear from him.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Mr. Richard Ertz has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment by the city court of Zwickau. The "crime," of course, is blasphemy. On the other hand, the state court of Leipzig has discharged Dr. Vogtherr, of Berlin, who for a similar offense was sentenced to six weeks in jail by the city court of Potsdam.

Freethinkers must be on the lookout now, especially in France, for reorganization of the "Society for Warfare against Atheism" has taken place. This society consists of old ladies, pious Bonapartists and Legitimists, and, of course, priests. But as the whole company has been blessed by the pope, perhaps we need hav no fear, remembering that as a rule a pope's blessing works like a curse.

Two weeks ago we announced that Dr. Titus Voelkel had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for blasphemous utterances against Roman Catholic dogmas. Since then we hav been informed that the champion of Freethought has been suddenly arrested and locked up on an order of the royal Saxon court of Halle. Why he is arrested no one knows, but it is supposed to be because he is too impious to be allowed at large. Nothing like the consistency of Christians: "Love your enemies."

The trouble in Austro-Hungary has been renewed. It is owing to the vague laws, and the unjust decisions given by different courts at various times, regarding the relation of the children of Freethinkers toward their parents and the church. Some judges hav decided that the fact that the parents are Freethinkers does not exempt their children from submitting to the rites of baptism and confirmation. Naturally Freethinkers object, hence the trouble. But as Dr. Schwella, editor of Der Lichtfreund, has taken up the matter, an organized opposition will be brought about, and with it, we trust, victory.

A savior has made his appearance in Gyoma, Hungary. He ordered his followers to crucify him; they made a good strong cross, but at the last moment the savior backed out. His indignant followers in their ignorance took him to the nearest court house, where the judge when informed of the matter told them to go ahead and crucify the Christ. "But," he added, "if he does not resurrect on the third day I will hang you all on the fourth day." The followers of this Christ hav not yet got their sins washed away in the blood of the new lamb.

In Denmark the pious king has for religious reasons prohibited the erection of a crematory. When the writer was last in Denmark the society for cremation numbered over three thousand members, representing all liberal professions. Since then it has grown, and now numbers people from all classes of society. It is unnecessary to mention, I suppose, that the pious king is very old, near his third childhood. This rather unpleasant bit of news is offset, however, by another decidedly comical. A petition signed by several hundred church-members (all are church-members in Denmark; even the writer of this news used to be) asked the minister of ecclesiastical affairs to discharge a certain clergyman on the ground that no one in the congregation ever knows what he is talking about. The clergyman in question is rabidly orthodox and preaches fire-and-brimstone sermons, so we do not wonder that no one understands him. A gentle hint that Christianity is dying out.

While we never hear of anyone becoming insane on embracing Freethought, we can scarcely pick up a paper without finding one or more instances of religious insanity. In the last number of La Reforma, an Italian paper, we find the following: In Mezzi-ausco a whole family, consisting of seven grown persons, were suddenly attacked by a religious mania. In the middle of the night, during a heavy snow storm, the family, four men and three women, ran naked out on the streets, began praying and yelling, and wound up by attempting to tear one another to pieces. The neighbors came to the rescue of the unfortunate ones, but not soon enough to prevent the youngest daughter, a beautiful girl seventeen years old, from killing her brother with a club and then throwing herself on the corpse and tearing out with her teeth its eyes and other parts, all of which she brandished in the air while crying, "I hav driven the evil spirits out of my brother!" What a beautiful result of belief in the religion of our savior!

A correspondent from Scranton, Pa., sends us a clipping from a German-European paper. From it we gather the information that the property in hard cash found in the house of the late Archbishop Simor of Grau, Hungary, amounted to $701 960—a rather large sum for a man who during his life held that, "Blessed be the poor," and hinted in a broad way that it was as easy for a rich man to get into heaven as for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. We hav doubts as to the salvation of the dear bishop's soul. And yet the matter has a serious, a tragic aspect, when we remember how poor, how miserable the populace of Austro-Hungary is, owing to the excessiv taxes and the "tender mercies" of the church.

Our friend C. Cilwa, the originator of the pansy emblem, recommended by the Universal Freethought Congress of 1890, has a very impious article in the last number of La Vérité. Space will not permit us to reproduce it entirely, but for the benefit of those of our friends who hav Catholic acquaintances we copy the following dates of the enunciation, by popes and councils, of the cardinal dogmas of the Roman Catholic church:

A D.
325, Divinity of Christ.
372 Worship of saints.
381 Divinity of the Holy Ghost.
600 Use of Latin in services.
688 726 784, Worship of images.
1000 1015, Celibacy of priests and religious orders.
1076, Infallibility of the church.
1119, Letters of indulgences.
1160, The seven sacraments.
1215, Transubstantiation.
1225, Auricular confession.
1459, Purgatory discovered.
1854, Immaculate conception of Mamma Mary.
1870, Infallibility of his fallibility the pope.

Religious persecution has begun again in Sweden. Viktor E. Lennstrand has been sentenced by that travesty of a civilized man, King Oscar the Little, to pay a fine of three hundred crowns for two lectures which he delivered previously to his last imprisonment, and for which he has been discharged as not guilty by the supreme court of Sweden. Evidently the clergy-ridden king fears the growing popularity of Mr. Lennstrand, whose lecture on the "Bible in the Light of Modern Science" is attracting such great audiences that he has been compelled to hire the second largest hall in Stockholm. Besides giving these lectures Lennstrand travels extensivly, and we do not see how he can get time to do all of his work, even with the assistance of that indefatigable worker and stanch Freethinker, Capt. Otto Thomson, for he not only lectures, but contributes excellent and scholarly editorials to Fritänkaren, and has also issued an annual "Ljus och Frihet" (light and freedom), which in interest and genuin information stands second to none. This annual, the price of which is twenty-five cents, contains likenesses and biographies of Colonel Ingersoll, Knut Wicksell, Ph.D., and Konrad Duebler, besides articles from Hugo, Dostojevski, and Lennstrand, and poems, the best of which is "A Christmas Song for Freethinkers," by E. Hellborg.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE lecture at the Manhattan Liberal Club, Friday evening, April 3d, will be by Dr. Charles H. Shephard. Subject: "The Sanitary Advantages of the Turkish Bath."

W. F. JAMIESON is lecturing in Arkansas (Rogers and Desbro), and is engaged to deliver lectures in Kansas a month ahead nearly every evening. Address, Burlington, Kan.

J. E REMSBURG is still preaching the gospel of Freethought in the Sunny South. While firing his hottest shots at superstition, he had, when last heard from, suffered no violence, and hoped to run the gauntlet safely. After leaving Florida he went to Chattanooga, Tenn., where he gave three lectures, closing his engagement there March 22d. On the 23d he lectured in the Opera House at Dalton, Ga., to a large audience. On the 24th he delivered a lecture in the court house at Centre, Ala., and on the 25th he addressed a small audience in the court house at Cullman, Ala. At every place the lectures were well received. In a notice of his last lecture at Chattanooga, the Chattanooga Daily Times says: "About four hundred people assembled last evening to listen to Hon. John Remsburg, of Kansas, to deliver his lecture on 'The Sunday Question.' Mr. Remsburg is a Freethinker of the most ultra school, and, judging from the frequent bursts of applause which greeted his remarks, a majority of his hearers agreed strongly with his opinions."

Communications.

Recent Gems from the Religious Press.

The Christian Advocate once more furnishes an apt illustration of the flimsy quality of argument put forth in favor of unquestioning faith. Hear it:

> The meekness required of a Christian in the reception of the truth [sic] is a childlike, teachable disposition, without which no one can learn anything, even from nature.

That is to say, after a young man has found out that Santa Claus is a myth, that a beautiful girl will tell fibs, that the average manufacturer of popular proverbs is a continental liar, that a king or a president is merely a bundle of human bones like himself, then must he get down on his bended knees and "with meekness and a childlike, teachable disposition" believe that which he cannot comprehend and never dare to find out.

The absolute and provable falsity of the Advocate's assertion that "without this childlike, teachable disposition no one can learn anything, even from nature," is easily seen in the fact that there does not exist anything in the visible realm of nature in its relation to man but what is susceptible of proof positiv and unanswerable.

It is the vain attempt to get beyond this realm of nature which girds us round about, that has brought all the trouble in the world, and when a man tells us that to be receptiv of nature's truths we need a lamblike faith and an absence of comprehension as deep and profound as an average Christian's, why, then of course we yield the palm and crown him—prince of liars.

The Sunday Union and Catholic Times still harps upon a familiar strain, "What is in thine hand?" heads an appeal for money, and after quoting Moses, David, the widow with her two mites, etc., concludes by citing the case of a poor girl and what she did for the church, as follows:

> A poor girl who had nothing but a sewing-machine used it to aid a feeble church. All her earnings above her needs were given toward building a house of worship, and in a year she had paid more in proportion to others a hundred times richer than she. So you can, if you will. Do likewise and reap the reward of Dorcas and the poor widow.

Is it not about time to get out a warrant for the arrest and punishment of these religious fakirs? To appeal to the very poorest of their victims to part with money which they absolutely need for their own sustenance! So strong is the hold of their superstition upon them that they hav been known to giv to the church and want themselvs. The character of men who will accept, much more demand, toll from these poor creatures, is not at all modified by priestly garments, but rather emphasizes the cold-blooded cruelty of the church upheld by the brawny arms of priest-ridden labor.

The Central Presbyterian, of Richmond, Va., in speaking of the "Church of Christ in Japan" expresses a fear that that infant church is not sufficiently fortified against Rationalism and Infidelity and says:

> The times require the utmost completeness and precision in doctrinal statement. The assaults of Skepticism are more and more subtle as history proceeds. Of course the spirit of God may counteract them successfully by preserving a high degree of spirituality.

Then the church doubts God, for "he may counteract it." May? If such a God exists and it was in his power to counteract it (which all Christians believe), and he did not do it, why waste time in futil human endeavor to stem the tide of omnipotent reason which is fast rising upon the unprotected shores of ancient superstitions? We giv fair warning—better take off your clerical garbs and jump into the pure waters of Rationalism, whose flowing tide will bear you up to fairest mountains of unshackled thought. Wait not to be submerged. The tide is rising fast; nothing will stay its onward course. The old levees, the old spiles, are fast crumbling to decay. The old mountains of lies and misrepresentations are receding before the argus-eyed optic of reason. All aboard!

From the New York Observer we glean the fact that:

> Lord Salisbury in a recent speech at Cambridge delivered an uncompromising denunciation of priestly rule, which he declares to be the great vice of religious organizations.

This is particularly gratifying, coming as it does from England's prime minister, but Lord Salisbury must be aware that the priest is but a creature of the church, from whose elastic constitution he finds abundant warrant for anything it may please him to do. Besides, the church, as well as his government, is a political machine.

The prime minister executes the behests of his fellow-aristocrats, which, of course, are shaped to contribute to their conjoint self-interests, in the retention of property originally stolen from others, in controling noisy claimants thereto, and the proper filching from laborers of the products of the soil. The detail of police, constables, sheriffs, militia, etc., for the proper preservation of this stolen property, of course involves political sagacity.

No less does the church yield in political acumen. The pope, who is the prime minister of, and stands at the head of, the religious thieves who hav stolen away the people's reason to play at football with, is of course never oblivious to his own or his fellow-craftsmen's interest (which in their disguise they call the church), and of course to perpetuate this spiritual swindle he must needs hav cardinals, bishops, priests, acolytes, churches, images, incense, and other toggery to keep up the joke and keep down the people. It works first-rate, too, and has a stronger hold upon its victims than does Lord Salisbury's government. If the latter wishes to eliminate the priest let him abolish the church, which would be quickly followed by the collapse of all monarchial governments, including the one Lord Salisbury so ably represents.

The Twentieth Century takes Samuel P. Putnam to task for calling the Mexican government the most liberal government on the face on the earth to-day, in the face of certain restrictions placed upon clericals in that country. Mr. Pentecost says:

> I judge from this that if the Mexican officials should drive the church people out of the country, or make it a capital offense to be a Christian, the Mexican government might be considered still more liberal.

As the Mexican government has done neither of these things, let us inquire what it is that it has done which would invalidate its title to be "the most liberal government on the face of the earth."

It is reported that a vast amount of church property has been confiscated. Convents are forbidden. The clericals are not allowed to wear their official garb on the streets. They must dress like other folks. They cannot perform a legal marriage. This is what the government has done, and it has done well. If our government would do the same it would perform but acts of justice and right.

The trouble with Mr. Pentecost's idea of liberty to let everyone do as they please is that it will not conform to present conditions, for the reason that by social and political usages we are made interdependent and a superstitious church and its blinded followers are a menace to the natural thought and rational action of those who do not affiliate with them nor wish to hav their children imbued with their senseless doctrins. The church is always seeking converts, is always aggressiv. Hav not the people as good right to ask for its abolishment as a common nuisance as its adherents hav for its continuance?

Its property is the aggregate outcome of the trembling fear of deluded victims powerless to help themselvs. Let it be returned to the people and put to some useful purpose. Mr. Pentecost forgets that the average man is no match for the arguments of these dealers in brimstone and eternal fire. They deceive men, they rob them, and they should be exterminated with a relentless hand, just the same as we do a burglar from our homes. The strong must protect the weak.

We suppose that Mr. Pentecost would be offended if he was forewarned that the sleek young man to whom he might be talking was a bunco steerer and thief; to follow his argument, it would be the proper thing to stand by and witness his plucking, because otherwise we might invade the sanctity of his individual freedom. No government or country should tolerate, much less protect, any institution which aims at the subversion of the human mind from its natural liberty of thought to one of base subjection to superstitious beliefs. Let them first prove the truth of their contentions, then giv them a license. Otherwise let the institution subside and end its disgraceful reign. We can find all the religion necessary at our hand within the realm of visible nature without groping aimlessly on its outside.

The Christian Union concludes an article entitled, "A Biblical Revival," by quoting as its epitome of the whole Bible business, that it is a recital of experiences of inspired men "who knew in part and who prophesied in part."

Mr. Abbott speaks tenderly to the mother who fears that the Bible will be taken away from her children by higher criticism, and logically tells her that by taking God out of it it will bring it nearer to her and her progeny.

That may do for some, Mr. Abbott, but not for all. There is Aunt Huldah Crane, she is "agin" it. She says them high-class critics ain't worth a hill of beans. Old Parson Hezekiah Hornblower, dead and gone to glory now nigh untow forty years ago, was worth more fer old-style orthodox sermons than all yer putterin' high falutin' ninnies, who think themselvs a match for God almighty, ever dreamed of knowing. But they'll git come up to when the horn of Gabriel blows, and don't you forget it. What? Blowing away hell and damnation and letting everybody into heaven! Don't believe a word of it—some's got to go to hell and some's got to go to heaven—that ends it."

Will Mr. Abbott make a tour through the country districts, please, and calm down that section of the church? Nothing like the soft, purring tones of a preacher to cool down a rantankerous woman.

The Independent publishes a communication from a correspondent who has been a church-member for forty years, and who is troubled when he seeks to pray by strange questions occurring to him, like the following: "What are you doing? Talking to empty space, are you? Who hears you? How do you know that there is anyone who cares for you? If there is anyone who cares for you why doesn't he speak to you and tell you so?"

Of these pertinent, reasonable questions the correspondent asks to be relieved, and seeks advice from the Independent as to how to get rid of them. The editor assures him "that this is a common experience with all Christians," and advises him to speak out his private prayers, and pay no attention to the intruding queries, as they don't amount to anything anyway. "The more he troubles about such thoughts the more they will trouble him."

How beautifully characteristic of your even Christian is this editorial advice! Pay no attention to reason or the protests of common sense, but go right on ignoring that most priceless gift; if possible, extirpate it, and become a meek and lowly follower of the lamb. There may be comfort in this, but it is akin to the comfort of a sleeping cat on a fleecy rug, and it reaches to about the same mental altitude. It is animal desire for safety which brings converts to Christianity, not mental progress or education. They are in it to save their precious individuality.

WILLIAM ALLEN SMITH.

A Tribute to Barrett.

Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Shakspere will appear in book form in his own good time. He does not care to hav imperfect reports printed. The following is his brief tribute to Lawrence Barrett, given as a prelude to his lecture at the Broadway Theater on the evening of March 22d:

"My heart tells me," said he, "that on the threshold of my address it will be appropriate for me to say a few words about the great actor who has just fallen into that sleep that we call death. Lawrence Barrett was my friend, and I was his. He was an interpreter of Shakspere, to whose creations he gave flesh and blood. He began at the foundation of his profession, and rose until he stood next to his friend—next to one who is regarded as the greatest tragedian of our time—next to Edwin Booth. The life of Lawrence Barrett was a success, because he honored himself and added glory to the stage.

"He did not seek for gain by pandering to the thoughtless, ignorant, or base. He gave the drama in its highest and most serious form. He shunned the questionable, the vulgar, and impure, and gave the intellectual, the pathetic, the manly, and the tragic. He did not stoop to conquer—he soared. He was fitted for the stage. He had a thoughtful face, a vibrant voice and the pose of chivalry, and besides he had patience, industry, courage, and the genius of success. He was a graceful and striking Bassanio, a thoughtful Hamlet, an intense Othello, a marvelous Harebell, and the best Cassius of his century.

"In the drama of our human life all are actors and no one knows his part. In this great play the scenes are shifted by unknown forces, and the commencement, plot, and end are still unknown—are still unguessed. One by one the players leave the stage and others take their places. There is no pause—the play goes on. No prompter's voice is heard, and no one has the slightest cue to what the next scene is to be.

"Will this great drama hav an end? Will the curtain fall at last? Will it rise again upon some other stage? Reason says perhaps, and hope still whispers yes.

"Sadly I bid my friend farewell. I admired the actor and I loved the man."

The lecture was a success from every point of view. The house was crowded and over two hundred people occupied seats on the stage. Hundreds were turned away from the box-office before the lecture began. The immense audience present, says the World, listened to an orator who was thoroughly wrapped up in his subject. Colonel Ingersoll is a Shakspere enthusiast, and his treatment of the immortal dramatist was masterly throughout and exquisit in its finer passages. He held the vast throng spell-bound, and at the close of his peroration his delighted hearers cheered again and again, until he was compelled to acknowledge the tribute to his eloquence by reappearing upon the stage.

There was deep and genuin sorrow in the orator's words as he pronounced the eulogy on Barrett. He then immediately began his lecture proper, and for over an hour and a half discussed and analyzed the genius of Shakspere. A more appreciativ or attentiv audience never listened to a lecturer. After declaring that it was hard to overstate the debt which humanity owes to men and women of genius, he told about the birth and early life of the subject of his discourse. Shakspere, he said, was too great a theme to adequately discuss. More than three centuries ago the most intellectual of the human race was born. The cradle in which he was rocked was canopied by neither myth nor miracle. This babe became the wonder of mankind. But little is known about his early years. It is certain that he never received anything more than the most ordinary of educations. Ignorant people are apt to overrate the value of education and think the colleges can transmit capability.

History tells but little, continued Colonel Ingersoll, about Shakspere's father or mother, or, for that matter, about himself. There is not a letter in existence which he is known to hav written or which is known to hav been written to him. About all that is known of his father is that he was officially reported for not going monthly to church. This is good so far as it goes. Neither is anything known of his mother beyond the fact that she had a beautiful name.

The speaker devoted some time to telling of the many great men who were contemporaneous with Shakspere, and called attention to the singularity of the fact that none of them are even mentioned in any of the plays. We can only account for Shakspere, said he, as we do for the highest mountain, the greatest river, or the most perfect gem. No really great play had been written since his time. Shakspere did not rely upon the scenic artist or the stage carpenter. He put his scenery in his lines. He dealt with elemental things and with universal man. Amid all surroundings the human heart is substantially the same.

The colonel ridiculed the idea that Bacon could be the author of Shakspere's plays. He quoted some poetry written by Bacon, and asked how it could be possible that Bacon had put the perfect children of his brain at Shakspere's doorstep and left the maimed and deformed at home. Bacon's best may compare with Shakspere's common, but Shakspere's best towers above anything Bacon ever wrote "like a domed temple above a beggar's hut."

About Mr. Bradlaugh Personally.

G. W. Foote in the Freethinker.

While at Northampton with Mr. Bradlaugh, and on other occasions, I saw something of his personal tastes and habits. He struck me as an abstemious man. He was far from a great eater, and I never noticed him drink anything at dinner but claret, which is not an intoxicating beverage. On the whole, I should say it is less injurious to the stomach and brain than tea or coffee. He was rather fond of a cup of tea seventeen years ago, and latterly his fondness for it developed into something like a passion. More than once I found him at St. John's Wood drinking a big cup of pretty strong tea, and was seduced by his genial invitation into joining him in that reckless indulgence. He used to smoke too in the old days, but I believe he gave up the practice under Mrs. Besant's influence. About seven years ago, however, he resumed it. I do not think he ever attained to the dignity of a pipe. He smoked cigars. Some time in April, 1889, I spent an hour with him at the House of Commons. He got the speaker's leave to take me into a lower smoke-room, and we "discussed" a cigar and some claret while discussing some Freethought business. The claret he seemed indifferent to, but he puffed the cigar with an air of enjoyment.

During the Northampton election times I used to take a good stiff daily walk. All through my youth I had plenty of exercise in the open air, and I still grow desperately fusty without a brisk tramp at least once in the twenty-four hours. Mr. Bradlaugh generally took a drive, and I remember telling him with youthful audacity that he ought to walk for his health's sake. Of course it was difficult for him to walk in the streets. His stature and bulk made him too noticeable, and mobbing was very unpleasant. But he might hav driven out of town and trudged a mile or two on the country roads. My opinion is that his neglect of physical exercise helped to shorten his life. Occasional bouts of fishing were very well in their way, but daily exercise is the necessary thing. I do not forget the tremendous labor, physical as well as mental, of lecturing on burning questions to large audiences. All that, however, goes on in hot, crowded rooms, full of vitiated air; and it givs no proper exercise to the legs and loins or the lower vital organs.

After one of my remonstrances Mr. Bradlaugh invited me to play a game of billiards. It was the only time I ever played with him. His style with the cue was spacious and splendid. The balls went flying about the board, and I chaffed him on his flukes. He had not the temperament of a billiard-player. Still, I hav heard that he played a fair game at St. Stephen's; but I can hardly believe it without first-hand testimony. I am willing to believe, however, that he was a good chess-player. Certainly he had a head for it. But chess is a vile game for a brain-worker, whose recreations should never involve a mental strain.

When I first knew Mr. Bradlaugh he was living at Tottenham. I never visited him there, but I often called on him at his later lodgings in Turner-street, Commercial road. He occupied the ground floor, consisting of two rooms. The back was his bedroom, and the front his library and workshop. It was what the Americans call a one-horse affair. Shelvs all round the room were filled with books. Mr. Bradlaugh sat at a desk with his back to the fireplace. On his right was the door communicating with his bedroom, facing him the door opening on the passage, and on his right the street window. The room itself could hardly hav been more than twelve or thirteen feet square. I once told him he was too near the fireplace, and he said it was sometimes good to hav the poker handy. At that I stared, and he told me the following story.

One day a gentleman called on him and was invited to take a chair. He sat down facing Mr. Bradlaugh, and explained that he wanted advice on a very particular matter. God almighty had told him to kill some one, and he had a difficulty in selecting a victim. Mr. Bradlaugh put his hand behind him and quietly grasped the poker. The inspired gentleman put the problem as a knotty one, and begged the assistance of the clever Iconoclast. "Well," said Mr. Bradlaugh, keeping quite cool, "what do you say to the archbishop of Canterbury?" "The very man!" exclaimed the inspired gentleman. He got Mr. Bradlaugh to giv the archbishop's address, and said, "Good-day," with a profusion of thanks. Mr. Bradlaugh went to the door to look for a policeman, but none was visible, and the inspired gentleman was soon out of sight.

"So you see," said Mr. Bradlaugh, "it is good to hav the poker handy. I never saw or heard of the man again, and I knew he couldn't get near the archbishop. There are too many flunkeys in the way."

Those were my struggling days, and Mr. Bradlaugh was very kind to me. I remember the Sunday evening when I told him I thought of taking to the Freethought platform. He pointed out the hard and thorny path I should hav to tread, but when he saw I was resolved on the attempt, he put his hand on my shoulder and said, "There is no young man in the movement I would sooner welcome."

In the very same room, on another Sunday evening a little later, I first saw James Thomson. He came down to the Hall of Science with Mr. Bradlaugh, in whose employment he then was, and I gave him the article I had brought for the National Reformer. He shook hands very cordially, and I was delighted to meet one for whose poetry I had a profound admiration.

It was also in the Hall of Science, about the same time, that I met the eccentric Mr. Tuberville, brother to Mr. Blackmore, the novelist. He was a man of parts with a bee in his bonnet. He claimed kinship with Tuberville, a minor poet of the sixteenth century, and he loved to talk of poetry. His knowledge of Shakspere was profound and minute. He admired Mr. Bradlaugh's perorations immensely, as well as his bold defense of Freethought. He made out a will in Mr. Bradlaugh's favor, but he subsequently made another will, and died in circumstances that necessitated an inquest. By agreement, however, Mr. Bradlaugh obtained £2,500 from the estate, and the windfall came opportunely, for his struggles and litigations had involved him in considerable debt. I know he had often to borrow money on heavy interest. One day, at Turner-street, he told me that a creditor of this species had coolly invited him to dinner. "Hang it," he said, "you can't dine with a man who charges you sixty per cent."

Bradlaugh's Burial.

"Sponge out the Record, make tardy amends
With tears of contrition that shame as they flow.
Blot out the Past, forgiv and be friends,
Up from his grave may the Olive grow!"
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

They who hav harried him till he is dead,
For their cowardly creeds shall reap as they sow.
Not at his tomb is the last word said:
We shall pay back to them all that we owe!
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

Over his ashes they pray for peace,
Who hav helped to quench his fiery glow;
But not for an hour will our battle cease;
Our spoils of triumph his tomb shall strow!
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

Do they think we hav ever forgotten the way
He was badgered and bandied to and fro?
Do they think we hav ever forgotten that day
Of the cruelest gladiatorial show?*
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

'Tis one more lost of unnumbered lives,
Wrecked, or taken by tortures slow!
'Tis the common lot of the Thinker who strives
To the death for Tyranny's overthrow!
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

Birds of the night from their hiding-place
Will venture to mount their middens and crow.
There are those who will feel he has turned his face
On the other side for their safer blow!
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

Deeds, not words, for our Champion brave;
Deeds that will lighten the weight of woe.
I may not follow his dust to the grave,
But I shall be with you when facing the foe.
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

Let the war-drums louder and louder roll
Defiance, as on for the goal we go!
Rise to the Hero's stature in soul:
Cower not down with the corse laid low.
AH! NO!
WE DO NOT BURY THE HATCHET SO!

May Be Open on Sunday.

From the Evening Sun.

It is more than likely that the Metropolitan museum will at last be open on Sundays, and that the working people, whose hard and uninteresting lives through the six other days make museums and such things possible, will hav a chance to look at the things which belong to them. The Metropolitan museum is not exactly an institution to be proud of.

It has some good pictures, but at least a hundred bad ones for every good one. It is difficult to reach. It has galleries consecrated to the glory of individuals who hav had the impudence or stupidity to present vile imitations of great masters to their fellow-citizens, and it is managed by men dull enough, or timid enough, to accept such stupid gifts and label them with the names and titles devised by the swindling dealers of Europe and America who thrive by palming such things off upon rich, vain, and uneducated Americans. But still there are some things to be learned in the museum. The microscopic reproductions of Europe's architectural wonders stimulate study and wake up the mind, though they are but toys in themselvs. The employees hav fine stripes on their uniforms, it is fun to work the turnstiles, the place is warm in winter and cool in summer, the collection of old glassware is really fine, though falsely labeled, and the inscription on the memorial erected by actors to Edgar Allen Poe is admirably adapted to make a cat die of laughing or to giv an Englishman a stitch in his side.

The enjoyment of these things should not be withheld from working people, and it is pleasing, therefore, to announce that the place will probably be opened to them on Sunday before very long.

But don't get a wrong idea about the thing. The directors of the museum are not going to open the museum from any feeling of decency, or because they hav come to recognize the rights of the people. If such things had any weight with them, the honest work and pleadings of the newspapers of New York would hav opened long since the doors of the institution which they selfishly govern. Other things hav influenced these directors. For instance, at first they based their refusal to open the museum on Sunday upon religious principles. It is quite true that there are pictures in the museum that would make the lowliest Christian swear any day in the week, and which should therefore be hidden on Sunday, such as the landscape painted by the poet Browning's son, presented by Mrs. Bloomfield Moore, a deep admirer of Browning, and hung at the top of a staircase. This picture, which to the scientific mind suggests the dissection of a human liver, is un-Christian, and so are some of the imitations in the Marquand collection. But the directors did not use these good arguments when they spoke of the necessity of closing the place on Sundays for religious reasons. On the contrary, the directors were talking in a general way; they were revealing themselvs, some of them at least, as hypocrits and liars.

The Evening Sun printed the fact that some of the directors had a habit of taking their families and friends to see the things on Sunday when the vulgar herd was locked out. This revelation was awkward. But something must be said, economy was urged, and a Metropolitan museum director had the impertinence to explain that it cost nothing to show the thing to himself, his friends, and his fellows on the Sabbath because, of course, they would not steal, and it was unnecessary to pay officials to watch the treasures on that day. With the working people, on the contrary, thieving was to be looked for, not to mention the horrible possibility of their coming with lunch-baskets to scatter crumbs.

Working people will owe the opening of the museum on Sundays, not to the honest protests of their own class, or to the newspapers which might represent them, but to the interest of society, that vague body which consists of educated people with time on their hands, and who, as a rule, are a fairly decent lot if you approach them on the right side.

These hav determined to hav the museum open all the week. They hav started out in earnest.

Teas are given where the directors are invited and talked to. Petitions are issued, and covered with the signatures of citizens who pay big rents.

To-day, for instance, such a petition was going about in the principal up and downtown restaurants. That carried about the Cafe Savarin by Mr. Oliver Sumner Teall was soon covered with names. It was a fair sample of the lot.

The Metropolitan museum, such as it is, will soon be open to everybody.

Freedom of Worship Bill.

Bill No. 347, introduced in the senate of New York state by Mr. Emerson, was referred to the judiciary committee, and a public hearing was given on it March 24th at Albany. The bill provides that no incorporated institution shall receive any state moneys "unless the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship" is allowed to all its beneficiaries. It is practically the same bill that has been offered many times during the past sixteen years, and though general in its scope is generally understood to be urged mainly to enable Roman Catholic priests to say mass and make proselytes in the House of Refuge, now under Protestant control. The waifs of New York who become wards of the state, are committed by police magistrates either to the Catholic Protectory, the Juvenil Asylum, or the House of Refuge. All are in their organization private institutions, but all are run on public moneys either appropriated in lump sums, or paid at the rate of $2 per child per week.

No one appeared before the committee to favor the bill, and the first to come forward against it was Mr. James M. King, secretary of "the National League for the Protection of American Institutions." He found many unconstitutional flaws in it, but started out with declaring it "unnecessary in that it proposes to correct an assumed violation of the constitution of the state, which violation does not exist," and concluded by recommending a radical cure for all this contention between sects by amending the New York state constitution by inserting as follows:

"This state shall not use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly, or in part, under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

He was followed by Mr. Miller, representing the House of Refuge, and he devoted himself mainly to asserting that the House of Refuge is entirely unsectarian, that clergymen of all denominations hav been invited to address the inmates, that they hav refused to permit the ceremony of regular "mass," and therefore the Jesuits are promoting this legislation. As he was becoming vehement in denouncing them, he was interrupted by the Rev. Mr. McLeod, of Albany, a Presbyterian preacher, who desired to speak also in opposition, laying stress on the inevitable religious controversy and strife which would follow if the bill were to become a law.

The committee was anxious to pass to the consideration of important constitutional amendments regarding elections, and at first reluctantly heard a few remarks from E. B. Foote, Jr., who appeared there, as he informed them, to represent the great "unchurched millions," those who were much interested in proper management of state affairs, in preventing any entangling alliances of church and state, and who would not sanction jobbing out state functions to private church institutions, however "unsectarian." Copies of the American Secular Union pamphlet were distributed, together with a printed slip giving the resolutions adopted a week ago at the Liberal Club meeting. The argument presented in behalf of Secularists, Agnostics, Liberals, Freethinkers, and pagans in general, made these points:

1. That all the arguments offered so far show that sectarian teaching in institutions receiving public support is unconstitutional; that nothing need be said to fortify the excellent and forcible arguments made by Mr. Cram six years ago (exhibited in pamphlet form) and Mr. Moller to-day; but,

2. That the House of Refuge was not run in the purely unsectarian way claimed; that there was a Methodist parson, Rev. W. C. Steele, stealing $2,000 per year and the accommodations of a well-furnished residence from funds appropriated by the county; that the printed "Manual of Devotion" (exhibited) teaches total depravity, vicarious atonement, miraculous incarnation, and eternal damnation, all sectarian dogmas, since the Universalists and Unitarians would not indorse them;

3. That Catholic and Protestant institutions are all run as proselyting machines, contrary to constitutional provisions; that the pickings are pretty fairly apportioned between them; and to giv each entrance to the other's domains would be to invite merry war and unending squabbles;

4. That, if the constitution is to be ignored, it is not advisable to make matters worse by legalizing the introduction of all sorts of religious ceremonies into state-supported institutions.

5. That the only thing to do, that is worth doing and doing well, is to abolish the present methods, establish purely state asylums for the care of all its wards, and employ no clericals or religious teachers in them; giving only such education in morality and civility as will enable the young persons, when discharged, to be good citizens and make their own way prosperously in the world.

6. That this is the only constitutional and satisfactory way to settle this quarrel; that in this matter there is but one right thing to do, and until it shall be done there will be a never-ending contest between sectarian societies for the profits they hav discovered in caring for juvenil delinquents at $102 per year when it costs them about $40.

Toward the end of the discussion Mr. McLeod offered the following substitute for the bill:

"An act with reference to the payments of moneys of the state to incorporated institutions, societies, and associations:

"It shall not be lawful for any officer of the state to pay to or for any incorporated institution, society, or association, nor to the managers, agents or officers thereof, any moneys of the state to be used for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding by appropriation, payment for services, expenses or otherwise, any church or religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is either wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

No doubt the Protestant sectarians would prefer the latter to the original bill, but probably they propose it with the expectation that it may defeat any action; while some of the Catholic party were heard to say that the best way would be to substitute secular state institutions for sectarian private ones, but if that can't be, then the "Freedom of Worship Bill" is the fair solution of the difficulty.

If both these great contestants meant what they say, the right thing could be done right speedily, but they are adepts at using words to conceal their thoughts, and the result is a drawn battle—with no gain to either, but a continued loss to "the unchurched millions" who pay taxes to pay costs of taking care of juvenil misfits at double the actual expense, while cramming them with creeds that are a hindrance rather than an aid to their becoming good citizens and practical, self-supporting men.

A Story Started On Its Way.

The Philadelphia Inquirer comes up again with the statement that

"Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has given evidence of late that his views upon the future state are undergoing something of a change. He is not as antagonistic as he was. He has lost his pugnaciousness. The sneer at all things religious is wanting. He seems to hav arrived at that point where he is ready to believe in the possibility that death does not end all."

The Inquirer finds its text in the eulogy of Lawrence Barrett by Mr. Ingersoll on the evening of his lecture on Shakspere, quoting these words:

"'My heart tells me that on the threshold of this address it will be appropriate,' he said, 'to say a few words about the great actor who has just fallen into that sleep that we call death.'"

The italicising is done by the Inquirer, which continues to quote:

"In the drama of our human life, all are actors and no one knows his part. In this great play the scenes are shifted by unknown forces, and the commencement, plot, and end are still unknown—are still unguessed. One by one the players leave the stage, and others take their places. There is no pause—the play goes on. No prompter's voice is heard, and no one has the slightest clue to what the next scene is to be.

"Will this great drama hav an end? Will the curtain fall at last? Will it rise again upon some other stage? Reason says perhaps, and hope still whispers yes."

Upon this last it comments:

"'Reason says perhaps.' That is the furthest that Ingersoll has ever gone. His reason heretofore has led him to declare the reverse. And when to reason he adds 'hope' he is getting dangerously near the line when Infidelism merges into Christianity."

We hav heard all this before—several times. But now, as then, it evidences no change in opinion by the great Agnostic. He has never said, at any time, in any speech, or book, or article, or conversation, that "death ends all;" nor has he denied the possibility of another life. Some of his utterances upon this subject it may be well to quote for comparison. The first public one that we recollect was in May, 1879, a tribute to his brother Ebon P. Ingersoll, when he said:

"Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the hights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our unavailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing."

Over the grave of little Harry Miller about the same time he said this:

"Why should we fear that which will come to all that is? We cannot tell, we do not know, which is the greater blessing—life or death. We cannot say that death is not a good. We do not know whether the grave is the end of this life, or the door of another, or whether the night here is not somewhere else a dawn. . . .

"Every cradle asks us 'Whence?' and every coffin 'Whither?' The poor barbarian, weeping above his dead, can answer these questions just as well as the robed priest of the most authentic creed. The tearful ignorance of the one is as consoling as the learned and unmeaning words of the other."

These were said years ago, but compare them with the words in the eulogy of Lawrence Barrett and see how little change in sentiment there is.

In 1884, in his lecture on Orthodoxy, he said:

"They tell me that the next terrible thing I do is to take away the hope of immortality! I do not, I would not, I could not. Immortality was first dreamed of by human love; and yet the church is going to take human love out of immortality. We love, therefore we wish to liv. A loved one dies and we wish to meet again; and from the affection of the human heart grew the great oak of the hope of immortality. Around that oak hav climbed the poisonous vines of superstition. Theologians, pretenders, soothsayers, parsons, priests, popes, bishops, hav taken advantage of that. They hav stood by graves and promised heaven. They hav stood by graves and prophesied a future filled with pain. They hav erected their toll-gates on the highway of life and hav collected money from fear.

"I would not destroy the faintest ray of human hope, but I deny that we got our idea of immortality from the Bible. It existed long before Moses. We find it symbolized through all Egypt, through all India. Wherever man has lived he has made another world in which to meet the lost of this.

"We do not know, we cannot say, whether death is a wall or a door; the beginning or end of a day; the spreading of pinions to soar, or the folding forever of wings; the rise or the set of a sun, or an endless life that brings rapture and love to every one."

In 1888 Colonel Ingersoll discussed religious questions with Dr. Henry M. Field. On the subject of immortality Mr. Ingersoll said:

"Upon the question of immortality you hav done me, unintentionally, a great injustice. With regard to that hope, I hav never uttered 'a flippant or a trivial' word. I hav said a thousand times, and I say again, that the idea of immortality, that, like a sea, has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, with its countless waves of hope and fear beating against the shores and rocks of time and fate, was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death.

"I hav said a thousand times, and I say again, that we do not know, we cannot say, whether death is a wall or a door—the beginning, or end, of a day—the spreading of pinions to soar, or the folding forever of wings—the rise or the set of a sun, or an endless life, that brings rapture and love to everyone.

"The belief in immortality is far older than Christianity. Thousands of years before Christ was born billions of people had lived and died in that hope. Upon countless graves had been laid in love and tears the emblems of another life. The heaven of the New Testament was to be in this world. The dead, after they were raised, were to liv here. Not one satisfactory word was said to hav been uttered by Christ—nothing philosophic, nothing clear, nothing that adorns, like a bow of promis, the cloud of doubt.

"According to the account in the New Testament, Christ was dead for a period of nearly three days. After his resurrection, why did not some one of his disciples ask him where he had been? Why did he not tell them what world he had visited? There was the opportunity to 'bring life and immortality to light.' And yet he was as silent as the grave that he had left—speechless as the stone that angels had rolled away.

"How do you account for this? Was it not infinitly cruel to leave the world in darkness and in doubt, when one word could hav filled all time with hope and light?

"The hope of immortality is the great oak round which hav climbed the poisonous vines of superstition. The vines hav not supported the oak—the oak has supported the vines. As long as men liv and love and die, this hope will blossom in the human heart.

"All I hav said upon this subject has been to express my hope and confess my lack of knowledge. Neither by word nor look hav I expressed any other feeling than sympathy with those who hope to liv again—for those who bend above their dead and dream of life to come. But I hav denounced the selfishness and heartlessness of those who expect for themselvs an eternity of joy, and for the rest of mankind predict, without a tear, a world of endless pain. Nothing can be more contemptible than such a hope—a hope that can giv satisfaction only to the hyenas of the human race."

Just before this, Colonel Ingersoll was troubled with a sore throat and the Christian press for several months seemed very solicitous as to his health and reported him weak and feeble physically, and not only that, but made the Inquirer's present assertion that there was a growing disposition on his part to lay down his arms, and even join the church. In an interview we had with him then we called these things to his attention, and he replied like this:

"I do not think the Christian press has been very solicitous about my health. Neither do I think that my health will ever add to theirs. The fact is, I am exceedingly well, and my throat is better than it has been in many years. Any one who imagins that I am disposed to lay down my arms can read my reply to Dr. Field in the November number of the North American Review. I see no particular difference in myself, except this: that my hatred of superstition becomes a little more and more intense; on the other hand, I see more clearly that all the superstitions were naturally produced, and I am now satisfied that every man does as he must, including priests and editors of religious papers."

The next year, June 25, 1889, Colonel Ingersoll wrote these words to Mr. E. R. Johnes:

"I congratulate you on what you hav said concerning the 'wax figures' of Milton. If anyone is open to the charge of barren Materialism, it is Milton. His 'heaven' was simply another England—with government somewhat worse. You hav endeavored to establish your doctrin by reason—by something universal—and you hav wisely left out the provincialism, the prejudices, and the puerilities of Christianity. Love and hope are universal. As long as men love and as long as they hope there will probably be in heart and brain the splendid dream of immortality. It may be that we liv no more—that we go back to the unconscious dust, and yet the heart will always say, 'Perhaps there is another life.' But whether there is or not let us all paint on the canvas of the future the pictures that delight and satisfy the soul. We know that in this world after joy comes grief, as after day comes night; and it may be there is some world where after grief comes joy, as after night comes day."

There doesn't seem to be much merging of "Infidelism into Christianity" in that. But this letter was made the basis of hundreds of articles in religious and secular journals—and if we recollect rightly, the Inquirer was the very paper to begin—claiming that Colonel Ingersoll "was backing down in the rigor of his assertions." But right on the heels of that letter Colonel Ingersoll wrote several articles indicting the Christian religion as thoroughly and as vigorously as ever, one of them being "Why I Am an Agnostic," and the subject was dropped. Now the Inquirer starts it again, with no better basis than before, and we suppose the story will grow, "going from Sunday-school to Sunday-school, from pulpit to pulpit, from hypocrit to savage—that is to say, from missionary to Hottentot—without the slightest evidence of fatigue—fresh and strong, and in its cheeks the roses and lilies of perfect health." Every Christian paper in the country will take the Inquirer's insinuation, probably change it to an affirmation of a fact, print it as the absolute truth, and the unthinking church folks will believe it. Then it will go over to England, from there to the continent, and then "be used by missionaries in China, Japan, India, and Africa."

"There are thousands and thousands of tongues ready to repeat what the owners know to be false, and these lies are part of the stock in trade, the valuable assets, of superstition. No church can afford to throw its property away. To admit that these stories are false now is to admit that the church has been busy lying for hundreds of years, and it is also to admit that the word of the church is not and cannot be taken as evidence of any fact."

Editorial Notes.

THE Baltimore World states facts succinctly. It says: "No one who has ever heard Bob Ingersoll talk or read bits of his beautiful word painting can but desire to hear more and read more. Ingersoll is a great friend of the 'good gray poet,' Walt Whitman. A lecture by Ingersoll on Whitman entitled 'Liberty in Literature' has just been published by the Truth Seeker Company." But why "Bob?" Why not Robert, or colonel?

E. H. MURRAY, a tourist, contrasts the Australian and Californian Sunday in these words: "The American Sunday simply baffles the Australian. In Sydney the day is observed with severe strictness; no bars are open, concerts are unknown, vehicles go slow in passing places of worship, and even a candy shop must remain closed for the day. But Sunday in San Franscisco is a gala day. However, I saw fewer people drunk on the street of San Franscisco on Sunday than in Melbourne or Sidney."

THE Catholics are building at South Yonkers a seminary to cost half a million of dollars. The grounds will comprise seventy acres, and over seventy thousand dollars were paid for them. Of course neither land nor buildings will pay taxes. Every city priest in the diocese will pay one hundred dollars, and every country priest seventy-five dollars, annually toward the cost. As a priest's salary in the city is alleged by the good Catholic people to be only six hundred dollars this will seriously cramp their finances.

THE last issue of Lucifer states that after nearly two months of delay the "writ of error" made out by David Overmeyer in the case of the United States against Moses Harman, charged with the violation of the postal laws, has been allowed by Judge Caldwell of the United States circuit court. By giving bond in the sum of $1,000 for appearance at the June session of the United States circuit court, to be held at Leavenworth, Kan., in June next, the editor of Lucifer is allowed to enjoy the sunshine and air of liberty a while longer. He is now bonded, in the two cases against him, in the sum of $6,000—$3,500 for his appearance at the said term of court, and $2,500 that he will prosecute his appeal "to effect," or to legal termination.

THE governor of New Hamphire has issued a "fast day" proclamation which ought to suit the God-in-the-Constitution party. He says: "Abstaining from our usual avocations let us all observe the day with decorum and solemnity. In the congregation of worshipers, at the family altar and in the closet, let us with sincere contrition acknowledge our transgressions before almighty God, who has been so fully revealed to us as our heavenly father by the Lord Jesus Christ our savior." Fast day in New Hampshire is a hollow humbug, like the preachers. Originally invented when the state was a part of Massachusetts and as grimly puritanical as a witch-whipping magistrate, the custom has been continued to these degenerate days when it is anything but a day of humiliating abstinence from food. With the exception of the Fourth of July it is as riotous a holiday as New Hampshire knows.

THE Christian Statesman says: "The New York legislature has a new tax bill before it, which still proposes to exempt churches from taxation as the laws of the state hav always done. The Secularists are making strenuous opposition to this feature of the bill. The state, however, will not be swayed by their clamor from its traditional policy. The exemption of churches, like schools, colleges, and hospitals, rests on the ground that these are not private property used for personal advantage or gain, but are devoted to the public good, and it is good policy to encourage the devotion of individual means to such ends. The opposition to it always proceeds on the denial of the truth and value of religion—that is on grounds distinctly Infidel." The Statesman is pretty nearly right in this last assertion. Very few people but Infidels are advocating the taxation of churches. But the Infidels will arrive at their destination sooner or later.

INFIDELS will now please join the church! Christianity is all right, and firm as the hills. Dr. Buckley says so in these words: "Infidels claim that their opposition to the Bible is founded on its inconsistencies and contradictions. If, however, each case were studied with care, it would be found that their attitude toward the Bible had its origin in some misrepresentation of that book. Nearly all Infidel attacks on the Bible are aimed at some caricature of its doctrins, and all the assaults of unbelievers on Christianity are leveled against false and distorted views of that system. They regard the bigotry, cruelty, and tyranny which persecuted and put to death such as refused to conform to certain unreasonable requirements, the fatalism of extreme Calvinism, and the inconsistency and hypocrisy which sometimes creep into every denomination as fair representations of Christianity, and deal their heaviest blows against these. The result is they hav never touched Christianity nor the Bible. These stand intact, bearing no mark of the battle-axes of the giants of unbelief." But if Christianity has never been touched, why these revisions of Bible and creeds? If it stands intact why try heretics and expel them from the pulpits? What is the church afraid of?

DR. FOOTE, the representativ of the Freethinkers at the hearing on the Freedom of Worship bill—editorially referred to elsewhere in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER—informs us that he was surprised to find Elbridge T. Gerry, the president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, working for the Roman Catholics in this matter. This zeal on the part of Mr. Gerry is probably due to the fact that the Catholics hav recently made a raid on the New York Juvenil Asylum, endeavoring to get their priests into that Protestant institution, and Mr. Gerry is probably willing to let them into the Randall's Island House of Refuge if they will let his pet institution alone. The Randall's Island Refuge is a state reformatory, and both Catholics and Protestants are willing to cripple it—the former on behalf of the Westchester Protectory, and the latter in the interest of the Juvenil Asylum. It is a game of grab of vagrant children, and a consequent grab of state funds, on the part of both churches. The Protestant opposers of the Freedom of Worship bill, as well as Senator Ives, the Catholic member of the committee, talked very fair at the hearing, but that was with intent to deceive. Senator Ives was the legislator who proposed to open the doors of the Juvenil Asylum to the priests, and the Protestant professional philanthropists realize that they must make concessions to save that institution exclusivly to themselvs. It's a matter of log-rolling.

WALTER E. REID, the medium sent to prison by Mr. Wanamaker's orders, has been released from the Detroit House of Correction, his term having expired. He was given a reception by the Grand Rapids Spiritualists on the evening of March 23d, when he lectured on "Ten Months a Convict and Its Lessons of Wisdom." Recalling incidents of his early life Mr. Reid explained why he left the church and became a Spiritualist. His parents both died while he was an infant, and at seven years of age he found himself wondering if he should ever meet them. That he might do so he joined a church. "I had begun to fear death," he told his audience, "because, unless I were a Christian, it would forever separate me from the parents I had never seen. 'Loving in Life and in Death not Separated,' is inscribed upon their tombstone. I, too, was now a Christian and a church-member and was ready to meet them. My mother had left me her precious little Bible, and it was while reading the pages of that book that I firmly determined to devote my life to its teachings. But, alas! an unforeseen and insurmountable obstacle intervened. By merest accident I learned that, while a man of great nobility of character, my father was not a Christian. Great God! The anguish of that moment. If he were not entitled to a place in heaven, where else could he be, according to the faith of the church of which I was a member, but in hell? The church lost its charms when it pointed a bony finger toward a hell for my father and a heaven for my mother." Then he became a Spiritualist and found peace.

THEY are very pious in Massachusetts on Sunday, but still Satan finds a way of ingratiating himself with the people. Cigars are not to be had on that day by ordinary purchase, but the druggists hav found a way to serve the slaves of the weed. A reporter for the Boston Herald stepped into a pharmacy at the South End a week or two ago and asked for some cigars. The young gentleman back of the counter handed over a peculiar package that looked as if it might contain cough drops or a corn cure. "Twenty-five cents," said the young man significantly, "or we can giv you something made from a different formula for fifteen cents." The package consisted of a cardboard 4 x 6 inches, and so folded as to make an elongated case open at the ends. Around this carefully folded was a dark paper wrapper sealed at the ends with red wax. Upon one of the broad sides of the package was printed the following:

"WONDER RELIEF.

"AN EFFICIENT ANODYNE

"To allay restlessness, calm mental and bodily nervousness, and to produce a general state of delightful languor and repose. A palliativ for Nervous Cough and paroxysms of Chronic Asthma. An aid to digestion."

At the back was printed: "Indorsed by many eminent physicians." Along the sides appeared the following:

"☞ CAUTION—This drug is a powerful sedativ poison, locally irritant, and should be kept beyond the reach of children.

"An infusion of twenty grains of this drug in a half-pint of water (used for an enema) will prove an efficient antidote for poisoning by strychnia. National Dispensatory, 21 Ed. 1880."

The scribe broke the sealed ends and drew forth three cigars. This reminds us of the experience of a New Yorker who recently visited the city of Worcester, a gentleman of age and consequent experience, who has managed so far in his life to get along without a guardian. The ride in the cars had made him thirsty, and when he got off the train he looked for a place to irrigate his throat. There was no saloon in sight, and he inquired of a nativ who said the demon of drink was not known in town. The nativ's statement was doubted by the visitor, and later on he saw a person who looked as though he occasionally tarried with his enemy, to whom he repeated his question. "See that barber-shop there?" returned the bibulous-looking individual. The visitor saw. "Go in there, and sit down in the chair," continued the interlocuted. "Get your hair brushed, giv the barber twenty-five cents, and then go into the back room and wash your hands. There's a closet over the sink and in it the barber sometimes leaves a bottle and a glass. You can't buy any liquor, but if you steal a drink no one will prosecute you." And it was just as the second nativ said.

Letters from Friends.

FORESTVILLE, N. Y., March 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I received your picture book, and was very much pleased with it and hav enjoyed it very much.

MRS. J. W. BENNETT.

HAVANA, ILL., Feb. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I believe this is the fifth year I hav taken your paper, and I am glad there is such a paper. I am proud of the way this paper battles for our rights, and my sincere hope is that it may continue to expose the absurd and ridiculous things so commonly found in the teachings of Christianity. J. A. WEABER.

GUSTAVUS, O., March 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a grand and glorious paper, just the kind of mental pabulum that I wish to provide for my family. No other periodical can boast of such a splendid corps of writers. In fact, the best brains in the country do the thinking for its columns. We could not possibly keep house without it. MARY A. CLISBY.

LONG HILL, CONN., March 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for renewal and $1 for "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" May the Lord be with you all, is my humble prayer.

Is not the controversy about the field secretary getting to be a rather wormy chestnut? They would better air their dirty linen in some backyard. JOHN L. BEARDSLEY.

BARRE, MASS., March 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I will only say in reply to Mr. W. L. Willis's peremptory letter in to-day's TRUTH SEEKER that when he will satisfactorily explain to scientists, philosophers, and anti-Spiritualists how these so-called spirit manifestations are performed with the aid of spirits, I will explain how they are performed without the aid of spirits. Mr. Willis is not in a state of inquiring receptivity, but of positiv defiance.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

NORTH MEHOOHANY, PA., March 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5 to renew my subscription. But this must come to a close before long, as infirmities and age are creeping on; but if I close my career before the two years roll around I shall hav the satisfaction of knowing that I hav contributed to extend the life of one of the grandest, freest, and most enlightened Liberal papers in the world. Had I the means I would endow it and make it free to all mankind and put it out of superstition's grasp.

LEVI KELLEY.

MAKANDA, ILL., March 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I think our cause is deeply disgraced by the unkind, bitter, and most undesirable controversy about the field secretary. I agree with you exactly as to the use of our funds—at least, until they are more abundant than at present. It seems as if we were never going to hav sense enough to organize and act in harmony. The church devoutly thanks God for our dissensions. They are the delight and joy of the enemy, as they are our shame and weakness.

W. W. WALKER.

DELAVAN, MINN., March 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1891, also a "Liberal Hymn-Book." We are well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and with Watson Heston's pictures and cartoons. The one in March 7th we would be glad to see fulfilled. We are old people, but my wife says she would like to see R. G. Ingersoll president; then there might be some prospect of seeing the idea of the cartoon fulfilled. I wish you the highest prosperity, also all true Liberals throughout the world. OLD 76.

BUSHNELL, ILL., March 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: This jangling and wrangling among bright Secular Liberals would seem, from a circumscribed standpoint, ludicrous, but considering its possible, aye, probable effect, it is anything but amusing. I would bring them all into the nursery, allowing no discussion as to who struck first, and make them kiss and go to bed like good children, "for we be brethren." The "Truth Seeker Text-Book" is an arsenal filled with most effectiv weapons. Let every Freethinker walk in and equip himself. The only fault I can find is, it is too nice to lend. S. L. BABBITT, M.D.

GREENVILLE, MICH., March 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I was in hopes some of my friends would send for the paper. We hav some Freethinkers, but they are not free enough to take the paper. We hav a plenty of free Christians, that hav a plenty of the popular policy, that come to our grange, and sometimes I "get there" with a selection that helps to civilize these Christians. And on the whole they are more Liberal than they were at the first of my reading my paper to them, for at first they would rub me out like a pencil-mark on a slate. So now I think your paper is the main part of the machinery that grinds out progression of the highest order. JOS. BURGESS.

SHIBLEY'S POINT, MO., Feb. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a petition for opening the World's Fair on Sunday. I could hav got more names, but the Christians are mad in these parts now. We had a debate between Elder Browder, their big gun, and James Magee, a country farmer. Browder affirmed that the Bible and science harmonize. He made it as clear as a mud-puddle. Magee affirmed that the Bible was of human origin. The cranky divine never attempted to answer a single argument, but did as all preachers do—when hard pressed did nothing but abuse his opponent. However, the debate has been a blessing here. Many hav had their eyes opened who supposed the Bible was of divine origin. Freethought is rapidly gaining ground here, especially among the young. The ghost-dancers must go. GEO. W. SCOBEE.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., March 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Lord, or the preachers, are doing a big work in our little burg. It commenced by the Baptists ducking a batch. The Methodists and Congregationalists were not to be outdone, so it has been which and t'other for some weeks—meetings every night in all three mills. The consequences—many souls saved and great additions to the churches. And yet the storekeepers say that the change of heart experienced by so many does not bring them around to pay their honest debts. Why should it, when Jesus paid it all?

An honest man's above their might;
A man's a man for a' that.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the whole fraternity.

ROBERT MILLER.

BLOOMDALE, O., Feb. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It givs me much pleasure to say that we had Mr. J. E. Remsburg here on the 16th inst., when he gave us his lecture on "Sabbath Breaking," and to our great surprise everything went off in the most genteel and orderly manner. We had expected trouble from some of the very good people. All seemed to be pleased with Mr. Remsburg and his talk, and some hav expressed sorrow that he did not speak longer. Others expected more hammer-and-tongs work and were surprised to hear such a scholarly discourse and such a gentle laying on of the stripes. It had been raining all day, and continued before and during the lecture, and still we had about two hundred persons to hear the blast of a Freethought trumpet. And from the commotion it caused for a few days there is no doubt but that some persons hav learned to view the question from a somewhat different point of vantage. Our local paper came out with a very favorable mention—had to giv credit where it was due.

Yours, etc., C. C. GERMANN.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Feb. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform you that Miss H. H. Gardener's book was duly received, and has been carefully read by myself and some of my friends, and with one voice we wish to say that we think it one of the most readable books that we hav ever read. Miss Gardener's unanswerable arguments while attacking the many vulnerable points of the old Jewish scrap-book—a book which has caused so much misery in the world, and yet is still being held as a holy terror over the trembling, ignorant souls who hav not the freedom and independence to think and judge for themselvs—are really refreshing. And her easy and effectiv manner in probing through the web of priestcraft sophistry, and letting in the light of science, reason, and truth, is really marvelous; and doubtless her work will meet with the highest appreciation by all true lovers of truth and Freethought. And we sincerely wish that every man and woman in the land had a volume of this work, and would giv it a thorough and careful reading. J. W. BARTELL.

DWIGHT, ILL., March 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I may as well pen you and the patrons a few lines again, for I see my subscription will soon expire, and it is an open secret, I believe, that editors would rather hav subscriptions renewed just before death than any other time. Though I may be a-pottering round quite a while yet, hence will renew for two years ahead and send you a quarter for the ANNUAL. Now, friends, a parting word—but as I never belonged to any church you must not expect me to address you in the ministerial tone, although old enough, being now in my sixty-fifth year. Well, I must be brief, and in case this should be my last, unless I can say something pretty awakening, why, I may pass away unknown and unsung. Now, by the old Jimtwister—I can scarcely think of anything very emphatic, but, friends, here goes the old reiteration, the best I hav in the locker for you, to wit—the most stupendous fraud and humbug ever palmed off on this world for truth is the holy Bible, consequently we cannot rely upon anything therein recorded. T. J. JOHNSON.

NORFOLK, NEB., March 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER that some are in favor of nominating R. G. Ingersoll for president of the United States. While I should be very glad to vote for him, I do not think that the people of the United States are quite ripe for electing him. Every church in the country would be turned into a political meeting-house and the preachers would preach against him. There is no question that R. G. Ingersoll would be as good a president as this country ever had, but did you ever know a preacher to be in favor of reform that would be for the benefit of the people at large? They are always in favor to fill their own pockets, and they promis the people something good in the sweet by and by. But to come back to the subject. I should like to see the Secular Union take hold of it, call a convention in proper time, and nominate R. G. Ingersoll for president of the United States in 1892. While we can hardly expect to elect him, it would bring out quite a discussion, and by so doing it would set a good many people to thinking, and thus it would be a gain for Liberalism. I would like to hear from some of our able writers on this matter, and set the ball a-rolling. C. F. W. MARQUARDT.

CORUNNA, IND., March 10, E. S. 291.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I hav seen a word from this part of the moral universe. Not wishing your readers to think we are converted to the Christian faith, I send greeting to your legion of truth seeking readers. We are still on the broad, level road that leads not to spirit land, but to eternal rest, peace, love, charity, and liberty. Despite my desire to liv again, I am thoroughly convinced that I shall not. If spirits were a thousand times more numerous than the living, as they must be if all who hav died are now spirits, it is indeed strange that not one has ever turned up in this vicinity. The churches are activ in this vicinity, and many persons are being converted to the carpenter's wife's son. Baptisms are taking place weekly all around us. They plunge the poor victim through a hole cut in the ice into the frigid waters of some muddy creek. It is indeed sorrowful to witness such scenes. But more sorrowful was I to see your old-time subscriber and worker in our ranks, Samuel Rakestraw, join the enemy. I cannot understand how such things are possible. His wife burnt a valuable library of books of your publication. But I am cheered to hear of progress in other places, even in Brazil, Mexico, and Europe.

Fraternally yours, JOS. A. SHADE.

KENT, O., March 20, 291.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose resolutions passed at the twelfth meeting of the Kent S. S. L. Association:

WHEREAS, Under the government of immutable law our associate brother, Ambrose C. Hind, has met death with that heroism born of an upright life; therefore be it

Resolved, That in our brother's untimely decease our country loses one of her bravest patriots—a defender who proved his patriotism in deeds of valor on many a hard-fought field, that the immortal Declaration of Independence might no longer remain a lie in the administration of that government projected by the genius of Paine, shaped by the wisdom of Jefferson and Franklin, protected by the sword of Washington, preserved by the generalship of Grant, and purified and perpetuated by the statesmanship of the martyred Lincoln.

Resolved, That this association, while deeply sympathizing with his family in its great bereavement, realizes the loss to the community of an exemplary citizen, and to the science of human cultivation the loss of a devoted student, who had the courage to let his light shine, in the face of persecution, on the solemn shams of superstition.

M. HEIGHTON, Sec. (ex-officio).

SPRINGFIELD, MO., March 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find sixty-five cents for pamphlets. I am ordering these for a young friend of mine, who, like myself, until recently has been a Sunday-school class teacher. But he has become much interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER and tracts which I hav. He wanted to buy them of me. I told him, No, I wasn't selling them, but he was perfectly welcome to read them all, and more if I had them. I say, scatter them abroad. He told me after pay-day on the railroad he would want several more books. I will try and get him to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER also.

Scatter them abroad, and speak
To all your friends about,
And tell them if for truth they seek
Just leave the Bible out.

Instead of it, you'll giv them this
TRUTH SEEKER and some tracts,
Which teach pure science, ignore myths,
And tell us what are facts.

Publish this, that others may know what new subscribers and members are doing. J. L. THOMAS.

SALMON CITY, IDA., March 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had a great deal of sickness in our family within the last year, and Christians hav had the audacity to tell us it is all on account of our belief. Our little boy has not walked for a year, on account of sickness, only by the aid of crutches, and he could not do that well until we treated him under Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York city. I think in another month our son will be able to walk without any aid of crutches or cane. Now, if the Christians' God afflicted our son in this way because his parents did not believe in that old Jewish history of wholesale murder, robbery, and rapin, why does he idle around and let Dr. Foote outgeneral him in one of his most pleasant pastimes, that of visiting the sins of the parents on the children? Truly Dr. Foote is a wonderful man. And if what the so-called Christians say is true, he, Dr. Foote, is more wonderful than ever. I would advise anyone in bad health or disabled in any way to advise with Dr. Foote. He will do just what he tells you he can do. If God knows all things, past, present, and future, he knew such men as Dr. Foote would exist. Why did he allow such grand, great, and good men as he to spring up and down his mighty work of revenge? The fact is, it is all a fable, and no thinking man or woman that pretends to believe it does actually believe it. We see occurrences every day that refute that old book of riddles and falsehoods. If God made something out of nothing, he might hav been thoughtful enough to procure a patent-right on the invention and sell out to some energetic man that could carry on the work after our mighty maker chose to retire from this little globe, so that many persons in the United States, and in fact, all over the world, would not be in a suffering condition, and helpless. But instead of doing so, he retired from this sphere, perched himself upon his magnificent throne of luxury, and peeps down upon this world of failure and destitution without ever one look of sympathy.

C. W. COCKRELL.

CENTREVILLE, ILL., March 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I received yours of the 5th inst. giving me to understand that I hav come to the station of 291, and I suppose I must get a ticket for the station on the line of Freethought for 292. As I do not think Christ will appear with old woolly-headed Gabe, or that this world will come to an end, by that time, I inclose $5 to pay for another year's journey with the rest of you godless scribes and pharisees.

And now I want to say a little about what you published in the paper some time ago about this infernal Mormon outfit here, giving your readers to understand that the Mormons were being persecuted by the Christians. I deny this; they are not. But just change the word "persecution" to prosecution by United States law for their beastly rascality and living in open violation of the laws of this great country. And old Woodruff's manifesto is a lie and all humbug. Do you suppose the old fellow, and Smoothbore Cannon, and many others, hav put the women away, and given them liberty, as the law requires? Not much. The fact is, the Mormons hate the law, and also its officers. And many of them are living with the women the same as usual, and some are hiding and skulking from the law and deputy marshals.

Well, now a little of something else. I think it would be a good thing to print John Peck's "India Rubber God" in pamphlet form, so we can send it to our friend.

Well, now I must tell you what I want: Two ANNUALS, two copies of Miss H. H. Gardener's book, "Men, Women, and Gods," and if you hav any of Mr. Bennett's "Gods of Superstition" send me some.

I find it uphill business to get a subscriber in this saintly place. It is like committing the unpardonable sin.

I admire the way the good lady, Miss Wixon, is conducting the "Children's Corner;" also the language of the other ladies who write for the paper. It seems time for women now to step to the front and vindicate their sex in vigorous language, fearlessly. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

WM. WILLIAMS.

MOAULEY, IDA., Feb. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your paper for about seven years, and never hav found fault with any of your editorials until the issue of February 7th, which has just been received. In your editorial on "The American Secular Union" you say that in your opinion we should not hav a field secretary at all. But I say that we should hav one, and the verdict of the contributors to the Guarantee Fund is the same. Those that pay for the fiddler hav a right to choose, and also say who the fiddler shall be, providing that they do not form or appoint a committee (in business it is called a board) to attend to the management of the affair. In my opinion, the members at the congress had a right to recommend whom they pleased, but no right to say to the board, You must accept this or that man, or, You must not question the ability of the person that we recommend to you. The board has also a right to say what the program of the field secretary shall be. The field secretary, as I understand it, should try to secularize the states and not the individual. Suppose that the state of Washington had tried to secularize all of its citizens first, why, they would hav to wait for state secularization until all Catholics were Protestants and all Protestants were Catholics. This, in my opinion, should be attempted by having the field secretary lecture on the Nine Demands and set them forth with as much ability as Dr. Westbrook has set forth "Church Taxation," and "Why the Bible Should Not be Read in Our Public Schools." And wherever the field secretary lectures petitions should be signed at once to repeal all laws that stand in opposition to the Nine Demands, and to make law of the Nine Demands. If we cannot do it in one year, let us try to do it in nine years.

I, for one, want some music from the Nine Demands, and hope that the Christians will dance to the music until they are outwinded and say, "Just stop that music and we will giv in to the Nine Demands." We want the Nine Demands expounded with great ability, and the field secretary that does this will not hav time to say that we are pampered by a clique of quasi-religious persons in the board of the American Secular Union. Mr. Charlesworth need not feel any more dislocated than any person else that asks for a position and does not get it. And I do not think that it looks very dignifying for anyone to call the board a clique of quasi-religious persons and look for a field secretaryship from them. And even if they were a clique of quasi-religious persons they would not hav appointed a quasi-religious field secretary when appointing Mr. Charles Watts, of Toronto.

Now, I hope that we will all dance to the music of the Nine Demands. Salute your partners, right and left, join hands, and circulate. HENRY BEIOHLING.

FRANK SWITOH, ORE., March 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to touch a few points and ask a few simple questions, which may be the cause of bringing out the truth regarding said points and questions, if the truth does not already appear on the face of them. My great question is: Why does not God practice his preachings? I will quote several of his teachings, and point out how he should practice them:

"Render unto Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar." Yes, and why not the adviser render unto the different states in which he is permanently located that which is the states'—taxes?

"Sell all that thou hast and giv to the poor." Who ever heard of God's selling anything to divide amongst the poor? But on the contrary, he takes what the poor had. I tell you, my friend, he does not even sell a piece of his property, even to pay his delinquencies with his hired hands—preachers, who can be found all over this world claiming to hav back salaries due them.

"It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for the rich to enter the kingdom of God." Who owns more in these United States than he? How does he expect to reach the kingdom? Perhaps he intends to arbitrate it. If he could only hav a committee of five, and let me pick the committee, I think he could make it all right. For instance, Romulus Teed as knave; Comstock, the man of morals, as jack; Holy John to play the deuce; Cardinal Gibbons as right bower, and the holy see (pope of Rome) as chairman. He would get there. Now, if God would sell half that he hath and distribute amongst us poor woodchoppers here in Oregon, I think we should be able to say as the dude did when his lady friend asked him to say grace at the tea party. He had never done such a thing in his life, and what a dilemma he was in! He rolled his eyes up and down the table, then to the floor, then to the ceiling, and as quick as a flash he clasped his hands and said: "Thanks, God, thanks. Thanks awfully."

Now, Mr. Editor, am I right—is not this excluding papers from the mails the first step to the suppression of the press? If they can stop your paper because it has an item contrary to law in it, can they not also make anything that does not suit their ideas contrary to law? Last November a little paper published in Kelso, Wash., had a little advertisment in it of some sort of a homespun lottery, which did not amount to anything, and the postmaster rejected the paper, and told the editor he did not like to do so but his political neck had the noose on it and he had to do so against his will to keep the Kelso post-office. Now, no one knows better than a country editor what it costs to run a small country paper, and its small circulation and the bad-pay subscribers who will take the paper two or three years and then if asked to square up make themselvs mad and quit the paper and the pay both. We all know that simple subscriptions would not pay office rent and keep a fire on damp, cold days. The advertising is where the money is, and if you cannot advertise you cannot exist, and if you do advertise you cannot mail. You might as well chase out the devil, make a pie of your case, and placard your door: "Holy John's holy breeze blighted us."

I append a short poem by myself.

HARRISON MAKES KNOWN HIS THOUGHTS TO HIS WIFE.

I'll rise quick in the morning, wife,
And I'll tell you what I'll do—
I'll take my little Johnny and
Giv him a talking to.

He has made an awful muss,
And surely he has seen it,
And now I'll raise a little fuss
If Johnny doesn't clean it.

He has played the devil in our mails;
He has trampled on the press;
And now he thinks he'll tie the rails
Of the U. S. mail express (Sundays).

He has got to stop right here, right now,
And take another track,
Or else he can lament on how
He came to get the sack.

He has got to stop right here or git—
I tell you, wife, 'twon't do—
Or else we'll lose our little grip
In eighteen ninety-two.

How true the saying of the bard
Who framed these words together:
"The rigid righteous is a fool,
And the rigid wise another."

That "Open Letter" from New York
About the holy Bible,
Shows his promptness to come when called
To be an open libel.

Those patriotic sons of light
Are fighting hard for truth
And liberty and equal rights—
They're taught it from their youth.

There he comes—Ha, John, come here!
What do you think of doing
To straighten up this present year
The fuss you've got a-brewing?

Ah, ah, just stop, sir, no back talk!
Or, damn your dirty pelt,
You'll hav to take a little walk
In some far land for health.

D. W. LEONARD.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., March 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Accept my thanks for your promptness in sending me the "Phonetic Primer" I asked you to get me. It is not as radical as I wanted, but from it I obtained several important points. The style of shorter spelling I wished to get was such as was published in either Cincinnati or Cleveland many years ago, and from which I received impressions that hav followed me down the years that hav since passed insisting upon recognition.

For my gratification, I hav written out eight lines in the ordinary way of spelling and then the same words in the style I call the "short way." In the "English as she is writ" 287 characters are required, while in the short way 189 answer the same purpose so far as I can determin, and I hav used but thirty-five characters. With 45 or 50 characters why cannot the English language be as elegantly expressed as by our present method, and at the same time leave the word so that the letters composing it will unerringly establish the pronunciation, without either teacher or dictionary; entailing upon the compositor much less work to accomplish the same end, and, above all, making the acquisition of our language so much easier for our little folks to obtain—which is hard enough at the best? As it is now, they hav not only the letter to learn but also its many sounds and inflections, as well as certain rules requiring its use in one place and not in another, making the burden unnecessarily heavy for the feeble mind to grasp. It does seem to me there should be an easier and a shorter method than the one now in use, and as THE TRUTH SEEKER is a sort of a revolutionary affair anyhow, why would it not be a good idea to print two pages, facing each other, in the shortest and most intelligible method that the ingenuity of the nineteenth century could formulate? Such insertion, with the sounds of the different characters composing its alphabet placed at the top of the page as a key, would, I think, be a worthy addition to the already interesting and unequaled TRUTH SEEKER, and which might induce other papers to add a column or two in like manner and increase the space from time to time as the public might demand the new for the old.

The eight lines I mention are these:

"ENGLISH AS SHE IS WRIT."

He caught at a laugh on the draught of a sough	36
Which brought on a cough before he was through	38
And he wrought in a trough a roughening of dough	39
Tough enough he thought to plough	28
The snake that sloughed its skin in a slough	36
The drunkard who fought the poisoning draught	39
Though fraught with phthisis enough he sought	39
To wreck the thoughts of yough or meigh	32
Total	287

In the absence of the characters necessary to represent the sounds of a phonetic alphabet such as I mention, we will substitute numerals for such characters as may be needed for illustrating my idea; and to denote the long sound of a vowel will double the letter:

au	as in	caught	represented by	2
th	"	with think	" "	3
ah	"	ah father	" "	4
th	"	them	" "	5

Now that the award has been made on the "moral" question, as poor as I am, I will contribute $5 toward a fund for the purpose of obtaining the best ideas leading to a method of spelling on a principle similar to what I hav marked out above. Will those who are more competent than I am to decide upon such a question giv their opinion as to its feasibility, and oblige, A seeker after truth, DE RENO.

CINCINNATI, O., March 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Regarding the "Pictorial Text-Book," which has been received in good order, I am unable to find words of admiration. It stands above criticism, both in art and its intrinsic value. It is a great cathedral of truth, moral and scientific; a real paradox of biblical sacred absurdities. It is incomparable with the so-called paradox of Rev. M. C. Lockwood's phraseology, an answer to which I herewith subjoin, to be given space in our good TRUTH SEEKER if you deem it advisable. DR. N. T. TANSKI.

THE DEVIL.

Answer to Rev. M. C. Lockwood, D.D.

In behalf of honest truth, I herewith take up the gage thrown down by Reverend Lockwood in last Sunday's issue of the Cincinnati Enquirer. The said challenge, quite a bombastic effusion, reads as follows:

"Wherever Christ is his [the devil's] works are destroyed. And the supreme spirit holds him forever bound a furious, raging, and immortal thrall. 'Why does not God kill him?' I answer that he does. He kills him wherever and in whomsoever God is known. The knowledge of the truth is the destruction of the devil. He was a liar from the beginning. Do I believe in the devil? No. Is there a devil? Yes. Who can explain my paradox?"

It is beyond any honest and well-balanced comprehension how an eminent doctor of divinity like Rev. M. C. Lockwood will not hesitate to style an article a paradox, of which he knows, or ought to know, that it does not contain any truth in disguise. Such teachings are simply and clearly heterodox.

Regarding your relationship to the devil, Rev. Mr. Lockwood, you are either purposely pretending to not believe in him, or you do so believe without becoming aware of this solemn fact, as long as you remain a Christian, true and faithful to your creed. It is a case of naked blasphemy to deny his Satanic majesty any and all dividends from the Christian belief and adoration, on a straight parallel with the supreme spirit of heaven.

Not the slightest animosity can possibly exist between the two great powers; on the contrary, the most harmonious understanding and coöperation is discernible in each and every important transaction concerning mankind. Instead of "holding him bound a furious and raging thrall," God actually prearranges the visits for the black prince of hades, and furnishes him free passes to wheresoever he counts on gains.

Without the devil's consent and valuable assistance, Jesus Christ would hav been absolutely powerless to redeem this sinful world. And, after carefully surveying the proceeds of this bloody undertaking, the cunning Cloven Foot seems to hav had a good reason to laugh in his sleeves.

Unless the devil agrees to lose his brains, and commits suicide, God will be unable to get rid of and kill him, no matter "wherever and in whomsoever God is known."

I heartily coincide with one of your sentiments, reverend friend, that "the knowledge of the truth is the destruction of the devil." But this very knowledge of the truth is equally fatal to the existence of the heavenly father; for, according to the generally accepted Christian, as well as your own, teaching, the whole and all knowledge of God consist merely in faith, in a pure and unadulterated "conception of the consciousness, apart from the media of the senses."

This constitutes, in a nutshell, my whole answer to your challenge, reverend sir; and that it is a true and honest paradox, in every point and term, I am ready to prove by the ecclesiastical codex of your own guiding star, the holy Bible itself.

I am at your service, Rev. M. C. Lockwood, D.D.

Respectfully, N. T. TANSKI, M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Misunderstood.

Two little sand heaps by the sea,
As much alike as pea and pea.

Beside one heap a little lad
With serious eyes, and all intent
Upon his work, with patience had Molded a mound, and as I went Past him, I wondered what it meant.
"A pie?" I asked. "A fort," said he.

Two little sand heaps by the sea,
As much alike as pea and pea.

Beside the other pile of sand
There sat a tiny gold-haired maid;
She patted with her baby hand
The warm white hillock, and I said,
"That is a noble fort you've made."
"No, 'tis a pie," she answered me.

Two little sand heaps by the sea,
As much alike as pea and pea.

We grown folk hardly understand
The happy fancies children hav.
Busy amid the sea-beach sand,
That is washed white by many a wave,
The boy would be a patriot brave,
A housewife would his sister be.

Two little sand heaps by the sea,
As much alike as pea and pea.

After Many Years.

[DEAR MISS WIXON: The following is a little story written by a schoolmate of mine. and thinking your readers would be interested I rewrote it and send it to you. She is very anxious to see it in print.—IDA A. BALLOU.]

"Hush, children, don't you see that you are bothering your pa?" And Hannah, a colored servant, spoke rather sharply to two little girls who were amusing themselvs in a rather noisy fashion in Mr. Sinclair's large and spacious drawing-room. He was a Sunday-school superintendent, and the father of the oldest girl, Ida. Lillian, the youngest girl, was adopted and treated as one of the family. He allowed the children the liberty of the drawing-room, since Lillian had a cold, and it was storming outside. While he is writing his sermon let us take a peep at the room and its inmates.

Mr. Sinclair was tall, dark, very stately, with a "stand-off don't-touch-me" air, that forbade any confidence, but inspired a fear and dread that no one could explain.

Ida resembled her father very much, had the same chilling reserve, and if thwarted was—well, not a very pleasant person to encounter. But if pleased, and she felt like it, she could be very sweet and agreeable—a little of her dead mother's sweetness of disposition.

But Lillian was just Ida's opposit, that is, in race color. Her complexion was a soft, pinky white, with pretty dark blue eyes that seemed to say, "I love and am yours if you love me." As for her character, that is hard to describe. She always seemed afraid of Mr. Sinclair and Ida. Yet I think, from a certain little instance that happened—I'll tell you of it afterward—she was, if aroused, anything but the timid, shrinking little girl that she looked to be.

It happened this way: Mr. Sinclair was interrupted from his interesting occupation of saying grace at the supper table by the voice of Hannah denouncing some one in not very polite tones; anyone would jump to the conclusion she was addressing some tramp. He was heard to say, "Now, my pretty gazel, you wouldn't go hard on a poor boy that hasn't tasted a mite of food since this morning, would you?"

"Well, the impudence!" exclaimed Hannah, indignantly. "Don't address your betters in that tone, young man, or——"

But here, yielding to Ida's entreaties to go and stop Hannah's language, Mr. Sinclair arrived on the scene.

It was a young boy about fifteen, with honest-looking eyes and a very ragged coat. After listening to the boy's plea and Hannah's indignation, Mr. Sinclair silenced the latter with, "Giv the boy something to eat, Hannah," then, after a moment, he continued, "Don't you know what Christ said, 'I was hungry and ye gave me meat.'" And with that he walked into the dining-room.

The boy chuckled softly to himself, "De ole cove is a minister, is he? Well, I ain't Christ, but if he is a follower he ought not to own this," holding up a silver fork and looking critically at it. "Therefore, 'Presto! change oh, and begone oh!'" the little vagabond tried to put it in his pocket after accomplishing his maneuvers successfully. But, alas! Hannah caught him in the very act, and dragged the culprit to where Mr. Sinclair sat peacefully eating his supper with Lillian and Ida.

"There, Mr. Sinclair," said Hannah, triumphantly. "You fed me, yes, but I didn't steal."

"Silence, Hannah!" thundered Mr. Sinclair, rising in a white heat and seizing the boy by the coat collar. "How dare you to insult my kindness in this manner by stealing? I repeat, how dare you?"

"But, sir——" commenced the boy, now thoroughly frightened.

"Don't you dare insult me in my own house." Administering blow upon blow he kicked the boy down the steps.

Ida couldn't keep her face straight, and got up and left the room fearing her father's anger.

Lillian rose also; her face was white as death, more with anger than fear. She did not dare to interfere, although she longed to. But instead, she hurried down the steps to where the boy stood ruefully wiping the blood off of his face. Lillian, with a great throb of pity, exclaimed, "I'm sorry, oh, so sorry! Here, my poor boy, is a fifty-cent piece; it's a small amount, I know, but it will get you a supper. Keep out of trouble, and try and keep honest. Good-bye." And Lillian hurried into the house again.

The boy looked at the shiny piece of money lying in his hand. "She's a stunner and no mistake. But the other. Ugh! she's too much like the old man. Did you see the black one laugh, though, when the old duffer kicked me?" And once more putting his dirty handkerchief to his face he limped away.

. . . . . .

Many years hav passed since that event. Mr. Sinclair has grown older, grayer, and sterner. Ida and Lillian hav not changed much. Ida is statelier, more beautiful, in her maturity. Lillian has developed into a sweet, whole-souled woman, one of the few women who are the blessings of humanity.

Ida and Lillian are in the carriage to attend the duchess's grand ball. It is in honor of her nephew, Sir William Chancy. More than one mamma's heart is fluttering for a daughter's chances for matrimony at that ball. Before it was over it was whispered that Miss Lillian Sinclair had secured the matrimonial prize, Sir William Chancy. For as soon as Sir William Chancy put his eyes on Ida and Lillian he recalled, oh, so vividly, the minister kicking him down stairs, and a laughing, mocking face, and a pitiful pale one, with blue eyes swimming in tears, for Sir William Chancy was no other than the little beggar boy Lillian had so generously befriended. He told her of it, too, one day, when in their own home they were sitting in their large drawing-room with their children on their laps. No one scolds them now, and Lillian exclaims, laughingly, as she looks fondly up in her husband's face, "I was hungry, and ye fed me not, but gave me a fifty-cent piece instead." FLORA MCEWEN.

Correspondence.

WEST EATON, N. Y., March 2, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mamma and Floyd and I went to Buffalo last fall. We went down to Niagara Falls. We went to Canada. I saw a rainbow, and I think it is very pleasant there.

I study spelling, geography, arithmetic, and reading. We hav four horses. We hav had lots of snow this winter and lots of fun sliding down hill.

I am ten years old. I think I will close for this time. JAMES W. DARROW.

STILLWATER, MONT., March 3, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I hav written to the Children's Corner. I like to look at THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. Papa and I are keeping house. I am thirteen years old. My birthday comes June 27th, and papa's birthday is May 27th. He is fifty-two years old. Mamma died on the 26th of November last. My oldest and only sister is married. I would like to hav another good mamma. Since mamma has died, our school has stopped, and I suppose I will hav to go away this spring to school. Well, I must close now, hoping to find this in print.

ABBIE FRANCES HUNDLEY.

REVERE, MASS., March 12, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am very sorry I could not get out to hear you lecture, but I had a bad cold. I hav not been to school for a week. I do not like staying at home very well. I am glad you had a pleasant day. I am in the grammar school, and I study arithmetic, geography, spelling, and reading. I am nine years old.

There was a lady in the audience Sunday when you spoke who said you looked enough like my papa to be his sister. If you were, that would make you my Aunt Susan.

MABEL F. WASHBURN.

[Mabel will hav to be counted as our little niece, anyway.—ED. C. C.]

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., March 3, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. I hav not written to it for about two years.

I read the letters in the Corner every week and like them very much.

I hav been sick for a long time and cannot go to school.

I am in the third grade and hav six studies—reading, history, spelling, arithmetic, geography, and business forms, besides practicing writing and drawing.

I suppose a great many of the boys and girls that write to the Corner hav never lived in the country. I hav, and I think it much nicer than living in towns or cities.

It has rained so hard here that the railroads are impassable, but the mail manages to get here somehow.

There is one church in this town and they talk of building another. We do not go to church or Sunday-school.

As I cannot think of anything more that would interest the readers of the Corner, I will close.

Your Liberal friend,

ELWIN D. RODGERS.

BUFFALO, N. Y., March 1, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has not been long since I wrote my last letter to the Children's Corner, but I wanted to write and thank George Remsburg for his kindly notice of my letter in the last issue. I was glad to hear that "the young people's paper" is progressing. It has always been my one hope that some day I should help the children. I thought they needed it so much; and was therefore very glad when the chance came in the shape of a letter from the editor of Fair Play, inviting me to conduct a children's department. I send a greeting to you, Miss Wixon, sister editor and teacher. Thank you for your kind advice. Reading your books when a child always left a deep and lasting impression upon my heart; and when I grew older I found that years hadn't erased the impression that Little Susie left there. I hav always wanted to write and thank you all I could. And now that the opportunity has come I havn't the time or space to write as much as I should like. But in conclusion, I will say that I cordially invite the readers of the Children's Corner to write to me as soon as convenient.

Ever your friend, IDA A. BALLOU.

[One of our little ones, grown up and able to take charge of a department in a newspaper! Is it not excellent? Go on and grow in grace and wisdom, Sister Ballou. Here's hearty congratulation from the ED. C. C.]

NORTH HURON, N. Y., March 4, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: To-day the wind is blowing very hard, the weather is cold, and the ground covered with snow. I liv about one mile from Lake Ontario, and about two from Big Sodus bay, where they fish all winter by cutting holes through the ice, and catch large numbers of pickerel and perch. I liv near a little lake, and go fishing with grandpa almost every day through the summer; we get fish that weigh five or six pounds and they are very fine.

I hav been sick about three weeks so that I hav not been able to go to school.

We hav two churches in this place, one school-house, two stores, one mill, blacksmith shop, and a billiard saloon. We hav almost all kinds of fruit that grow in this latitude, such as apples, pears, peaches, apricots, plums, quinces, and cherries.

I would like to hav you come out here in the summer when the fruit is ripe and go fishing with me. Grandpa has a little sail-boat, so we can go sailing when it is pleasant.

I had a letter from a girl that liv's in Otay, San Diego county, California; she saw one of my letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so she wrote to me. Her name is Grace Johnson.

Grandpa has one or two hundred back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he says he will send them to anyone that will send their name and post-office address to him, free.

My papa is postmaster here, and we get our mail every day. I guess I will close.

From your friend, BERTHA E. WEED.

[We would be pleased to visit Bertha some time and go sailing on the lake with her.—ED. C. C.]

"Only Loving Them."

A baby-carriage stood in front of a small shop. In it slept a pretty dimpled baby. A drowsy puppy lay on the pillow, its black nose close to the baby's cheek.

By the carriage stood a ragged little waif, dirty, with scarcely enough clothes for decency. She stroked in turn the baby and the puppy.

A lady, passing by, noticed the strange picture—the cunning little dog, the ragged child. The baby's mother was in the shop.

"Are you caring for these?" said the lady to the waif.

A wonderful smile lit up the dirty little face. "No, please, ma'am. I'm only loving them."

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

HOW TO PRESERVE HEALTH.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

CONTENTS:

The Prevention of Disease—Hygiene of Different Organs—Age and Occupation—The Dwelling—The Care of the Sick—Nursing—The Family Physician—How to Giv Aid in Emergencies—Contagious and Miasmatic Diseases—Diseases of the Nervous System—Altered Nutrition—The Respiratory and Digestiv and Urinary Tracts—The Skin—Parasites—Motherhood.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College, N. Y., says: "I regard your book, 'How to Preserve Health,' as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav ever met. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family and in the library of every school, for I think it would popularize a vast amount of important and useful knowledge, and thus be of great service to the community. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it; that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging, which our anxious grandmothers and others lacking the requisit elementary knowledge are too prone to indulge in, and oftentimes do great harm thereby. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

John B. Hamilton, M.D., Surgeon-General of the Navy, and Professor of Surgery, Georgetown University: "I thank you for the excellent book, 'How to Preserve Health.' I hav no doubt of the necessity of such books, and yours is of such merit that it will surely be successful."

Samuel Sherwell, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Skin, Brooklyn: "Your excellent treatise, entitled 'How to Preserve Health,' appears to me admirably adapted for the reading of the laity, correcting as it does a large number of false impressions that prevail among them. The direct suggestions, as in remarks on the skin, are of decided value."

THE

French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparative oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail to receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

CANCER and Tumors CURED: no knife: book free. Drs. GRATIGNY & DIX, No. 163 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

DONALD KENNEDY of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Price $1.50. News of the Week.

CATHOLICS are angry at the proposal of the New York board of education to reward teachers who hav served well fourteen years without having been absent more than two hundred days, by ordering that their salaries be not less than $750. This causes Catholics to denounce "the public school system and its proposed raids on state treasuries."

REV. HOWARD CROSBY died on the 29th ult.

THE pope has sent the World's Fair an apostolical benediction.

IN England prohibition of the reckless practicing of hypnotism is asked.

THE Mafia trouble may cause Italy to refuse participation in the Exposition.

THE grip is raging, especially in Chicago, where there are many deaths.

WALTER CHAPIN, of New York, died on the 20th ult. of pneumonia neglected under faith cure treatment.

IT is thought that the World's Fair committee should hav asked Whitman or some other American poet for a dedicatory ode in place of Tennyson.

IN Russia recently, under the law forbidding those born in the state church ever to leave it for another, hundreds of converts to other sects were sent to Siberia.

CATHOLICS are trying to induce the president to remove Commissioner of Indian Schools Morgan, alleging discrimination against Catholic teachers. He says he has removed such teachers only for insubordination.

THE British government has announced a royal commission to consider the labor question.

THE English Law Times reports general complaint among lawyers of lack of business. "Crime and contention are both declining."

EVA BRANNOCK, of Pittsburgh, Pa., a religious enthusiast and faith cure believer, said that she met a command to fast every time she opened the Bible, and began a forty days' fast, which she completed on the 26th ult.—whether honestly or not no one knows.

THE Kansas agent of the Farmers' Alliance has sent advertisments to the Alliance papers throughout the state, stating that he would advance money to all farmers depositing grain in the Alliance warehouses sufficient to meet their necessities and would giv them the advantage of the rise in the market when it came.

ON the 29th ult. at the burial of Jen Sen in a neat lot owned by Chinamen in a Pittsburgh cemetery, 1,500 men and boys trampled graves and shrubbery, jostled mourners, and snatched the coins, printed prayers, burning joss sticks, and perfumed paper placed on the graves by the Chinese, accompanying the scene with cat calls, jeers, and howls.

CATHOLICS complain of the American League, an organization to oppose election of Catholic political candidates, especially strong in Illinois. The Memphis Catholic Journal says: "There is only one sure method of uprooting this deadly evil, and that is the remedy that Chicago applied to a few of the leaders of the Anarchist movement."

A RECALCITRANT Catholic of Montreal, Can., named Le May, on being solicited to return to the church mission cried, "To hell with the mission," and began cursing priests, pope, and church, when he was stricken speechless and partly helpless. The doctors pronounced the seizure paralysis from excitement, but Catholics in Canada and this country combat the physicians and claim it as a divine visitation.

CATHOLIC leaders in summing up the year since the last Easter, remark: "In regard to the question of incorporating voluntary or religious schools into the public system, some progress has been made in New York state, whose influence over the school system of the country is likely to be marked. Several Catholic high schools or colleges hav been admitted to the benefits of the state university scheme, and some of the regents hav expressed the opinion that this can only be the forerunner of a long-delayed act of justice—the admission of Catholic and other religious schools to the benefits of the tax paid by all the citizens."

The people rose upon him, and nothing could save him from a violent death at the hands of the mob. All religious persecutions, if it be allowed to compare the little with the great, may be reduced to this one denomination. The heretic, actually or by implication, killed a consecrated cat, and the orthodox would fain kill him. But, as the same thing is not sacred in all countries (for even asses hav their worshipers), the cat killer, although an abomination in Egypt, would be a great saint in some lands where dogs are worshiped.—Theodore Parker

Notes and Clippings.

THE bill for the disestablishment of the national church in Wales was rejected by a majority of thirty-two in the House of Commons.

DR. MORTIMER GRANVILLE, of London, has cabled this formula for the grip to the Chicago health department: "Dr. Mortimer Granville begs physicians to try five grains camphor in twenty minims tincture of iodine and one dram of glycerine, with syrup, frequently for influenza. Strong meat juice is also recommended. No antipyrine." With the statement that the doctor is one of the most eminent physicians of the day, and during the prevalence of the grip last year contributed much to the medical literature of the subject, the Chicago health officer gives the formula to the public without recommendation.

REV. JOHN R. EBERLY, of Lewistown, Pa., has shown a partiality for the phrase, "O Lord, shower thy blessings down upon us!" which is incorporated in all his prayers. When this period of his invocation was reached the other night the congregation was thrown into a state of consternation by a copious fall of water from a trap-door directly over the minister, drenching him through and through. The services were checked by this extraordinary fulfillment of the preacher's supplication, and tranquillity was not reestablished until an investigation revealed the cause of the unexpected downpour. John L. Smith, a fifteen-year-old boy, had secreted himself in the attic of the school-house before the meeting and given practical effect to the Rev. Mr. Eberly's prayer with two buckets of water.

THE terms of the new law for the regulation of immigration, which went into effect on the 1st instant, are more stringent than those of the law of 1885, which has been violated with impunity. It provides for the exclusion of certain classes of undesirable immigrants, and for the sending back of all who come here unlawfully, including those who become a public charge within a year from the time of landing. It provides for a prompt and thorough inspection of immigrants by authorized officers empowered to determin their right to land. It puts a check upon the operations of the agents of steamship companies in Europe by prohibiting them from stimulating immigration to this country. The federal courts are to hav full jurisdiction in all causes arising under the law, and penalties are provided for its violation.

SOME one signing himself "Catholic Layman" has written this sarcastic letter to the Times of this city: "In an editorial you say that the Roman Catholic Protectory, in addition to being run as a profitable boarding-house, is used to secure proselytes. In support of this you show the number of inmates in the House of Refuge is decreasing, to the profit of the Protectory. Now, permit me to say that your imputation is unjust. In securing the inmates of the Protectory our priests hav been actuated only with the desire to minister to the spiritual welfare of the members of their own church. The great difference between the number of inmates of the House of Refuge and those of the Roman Catholic Protectory is simply indicativ of a larger Catholic crimiaal element, as an investigation will speedily show. We Catholics hav all we can do looking after and endeavoring to prevent the increase of our own criminals, without proselyting Protestant ones."

ABOUT two miles above Parkersburg, W. Va., the site of a large prehistoric village has been found, and many relics unearthed. The scope of the village covers an area of about four acres, and presents the appearance of having been at one time closely packed with people. The earth is burnt in many places, and is intermixed with fragments of pottery, bones of animals, such as deer, bear, turtles, etc , with many utensils and ornaments of stone, bone, and shells. W. T. Miller, a young archæologist, reports that in one half day he discovered in a large excavation made in one part of the field a skeleton in a sitting posture, with knees elevated and arms crossing the breast, facing the west. With this skeleton were found forty-nine bone and two hundred and fifty shell beads. About two feet from this one another was found, also with its head facing west. Two hundred and fifty bone and shell beads were found by its side. Another one was found within three feet, extended with its head to the west, with a heavy stone weighing fifteen or twenty pounds lying on its breast. There were two hundred beads of shell and two hundred and ten beads of bear teeth by its side. The bones of these skeletons were all badly decayed. Their size indicated that they had belonged to a people about the hight of a medium-sized man, but of much stronger and heavier bone.

AN exchange thus wrestles with the problem of Adam's racial peculiarities: "There has always been a tradition among the Africans that the first man God created was a black man, and that the scare he and his consort received when God called upon them to know why they were in hiding after they had eaten of the forbidden fruit caused them to turn pale with sheer fright. How much of a basis of truth there is for this curious belief it would be hard to tell; antiquarian research having, during the last decade, added to rather than taken from the original tradition. The earliest memorial tablets found by the late George Smith in Palestine and other parts of the orient, giv the tradition high credit. One of Mr. Smith's inscriptions or tablets, which has been deposited in the British museum, in class K, No. 3,364, gives an account of the creation of man by the god Mir-ku, or 'Noble Crown,' and runs as follows: 'To fear them [the gods] he made man; the breath of life was in him. May the [the god Mir-ku] be established, and may his will not fail in the mouths of the dark races which his hand has made.' The above is said to be the earliest allusion in existence to the biblical account of creation, and it distinctly points to the first race as being dark and confirms what Sir Henry Rawlinson said long ago—that is, that the word 'Adamn' (Adam) means 'dark race,' in distinction from 'Sarku,' meaning 'light race.' Mr. Smith during his life put forth many ingenious arguments to prove that the account of the sons of God marrying the daughters of men (Gen. vi) simply meant that the Sarku were intermarrying with the Adamn people. To sum the whole matter up, was Adam a negro?"

Christianity Charged with Plagiarism.

From the New York Herald.

I consider the New Testament certainly of Indian origin! This, I think, can easily be proved by the numerous points of resemblance between the lives and doctrins of the founders of the Buddhist and Christian religions, coincidences which are certainly not the result of mere chance or accident.

The conclusion which every honest inquirer is then forced to is that one account must necessarily be a copy of the other, and since the Buddhist biographer, living long before the birth of Christ, could not hav borrowed from the Christian one, the plain inference is that the early creed-mongers of Alexandria were guilty of an act of plagiarism. The parallels in the lives and histories of the two sages are clearly drawn, and I summarize some of them.

THE TEMPTATION OF BUDDHA AND CHRIST.

THE GENEALOGIES.

The genealogies of both are carefully traced from their respectiv ancestral kings (Mahasammata and David) down to their fathers (Suddhodana and Joseph), who, on the other hand, according to both legends, were not their real fathers. Both virgins (Maya and Mary), who were to become their mothers, were greeted previously by the angels and devas.

The conception by the Holy Ghost announced by Gabriel corresponds with the dream of Maya of a white elephant from heaven entering her side.

The wise men from the East came to offer frankincense and myrrh; so at the birth of Buddha gods and devas, princes and brahmans, came with presents.

As Herod was afraid of the child, so King Bimbisara made inquiries from his ministers to search the land and find whether anyone lived who by his superiority would become famous.

The Simeon of the Bible corresponds with the Brahman Asita, an aged man who came down from the Himalayas to see the thirty-two marks and the eighty signs of the Buddha.

The presentation in the temple of Jesus is similar to the request made to the father of Buddha by the elders of the Sakya race, that the child be taken solemnly to the temple, which was done with great pomp.

In his twelfth year Jesus was found discoursing in the temple with the teachers, so the father of Buddha found the Holy Son in the wood surrounded by the wise of ages past, both hearing and asking them questions. The forty days' fast in the wilderness is common to both teachers, as also the temptations by the devil and the temptation by Mara and his host. Then the angels ministered to both. Afterward the Buddha bathed in the stream Naranjana and Jesus was baptized in the river Jordan. The heavens opening and the voice from heaven proclaiming the teacher are to be found in the Buddhist scriptures.

The Sermon on the Mount begins with blessings; so, too, in the Lalita Vivtara of Buddha. The Buddha preached many of his sermons from a holy hill situated in the neighborhood of Rayagriha, the Buddhist Capernaum. The first disciples were followers of John the Baptist; so, in the Buddhist legend, the followers of the Brahman Rudraka. The first number of disciples in both accounts was five; then in both the number increases to sixty, seventy, and eighty. Jesus sent them two by two; in the Buddhist books it is said that Buddha asked them not to go two by two, in order that information might be spread wider, but afterward allowed them to go two by two to be a comfort one to another.

Both teachers were regarded by some as God, by others as sent by the devil.

Both performed wonders—healing the sick, feeding the hungry, etc.

The walking upon the waters and the declaration of death some time before are common.

MORE PARALLELS.

We can continue these parallels further:

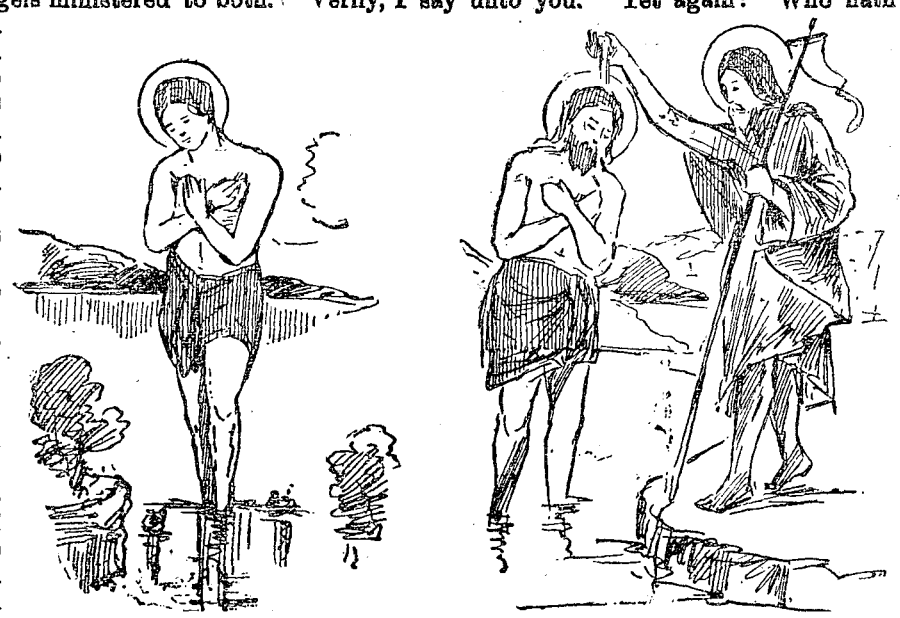
Thus the woman from the crowd called him blessed. The Samaritan woman at the well and the Chandala woman. The courtesan Magdalena and the courtesan Ambapali, both converted by the teachers. The rich man who came to Buddha by night and Nicodemus.

The triumphal entry into Jerusalem and the triumphal entry into Rajagriha.

Jesus said to Peter, "Move away," as Buddha to his disciple Upawana. The missionary command, "Go and preach," was given by both.

In the Buddhist legend we hav the traitor Devadatta, the same as Judas in the Christian legend. Wonders and earthquakes, etc., occurred at the death of both sages. We hav also the parting of the garments and the strife for the relics. And before their death both masters put a similar question: "Which among you can accuse me of a sin?" said Christ. And Buddha, "In me there is no vestige of selfishness, nor of envy, nor of covetousness, nor of desire."

Professor Seydel, of the University of Leipsic, instances in his work, "Das Evangelium von Jesu," fifty-one analogies all distinctly pointing to Buddhism rather than Christianity as the original source. The probability is that Buddhist legends were carried over by the Essenes and others into Palestine, and were made use of by the evangelists to adorn the gospel narrativ.



Professor Beal, too, in his "Romantic Legend," cites many singular coincidences. Dr. Hubbe Schleiden in his work entitled "Jesus ein Buddhist," quotes in all some hundred parallels.

Indeed, the abundance of the materials for the argument in favor of the formal harmony of the Christian and Buddhist tradition is so great that I must limit myself to a few more typical examples.

BUDDHA THE SAVIOR.

Just as the Buddha was pointed out as the physician, savior, and deliverer—as the deliverer from the bonds of iniquity, as the deliverer from sin, death, the devil, and hell—even so were the disciples and his followers called the "Children of God," and according to some authorities as sons or children of Buddha. It is also remarkable that the formula "Follow me!" is especially stated in the Buddhist accounts to hav been the usual one in calling the disciples. And as in the gospel of John, Jesus is supposed to say, "My kingdom is not of this world," so also the saying attributed to the Buddha reads, "I know indeed that a kingdom is appointed for me, but it is not a worldly kingdom which I seek."

Surprising, too, is the striking similarity apparent in both accounts of even the usual changes of phraseology at the introduction and conclusion of the preaching. Thus these phrases occur over and over again: "At this time," or "Again at that time," "Verily, I say unto you." Yet again: "Who hath ears to hear let him hear the word," "In order that it might be fulfilled which was spoken," etc.

THE BAPTISM OF BUDDHA AND CHRIST.

Since these expressions occur not once but frequently throughout the narrativs, we are compelled to conclude from the resemblance that the evangelists living later must hav had before them the sacred scriptures of the Buddhists. Like Luke, the Abhiniskramana Sutta concludes the first period of the master's life with the words, "So the child waxed and increased in strength." In addition to the mere verbal resemblances are to be remarked some of the chief hymns, such as the songs of the heavenly hosts at the birth, and the annunciation to Mary by the angel Gabriel, which should be compared with the Gathas recited by the Brahmans at the interpretation of the corresponding vision of the mother of Buddha.

Similarly the many poetical interpolations in Luke all bear a like character in style and sound, and carry the impress of the Mahayana writings of the Buddhist Gathas.

INCONSISTENCIES IN THE GOSPEL.

When we find in a short sentence in the gospel of Mark (i, 13) the history of the temptation, we know directly that it is an extract from other poetical pieces. Now, it is there stated, "And he was with wild beasts." Indeed, anything similar to this is not found in the other gospels, which might hav served as a coincidence, but only in the expositions of the Buddhist accounts. Nor does this correspond with the other words which Matthew also has, "The angels ministered unto him." These ministrations relating to the temptations in the wilderness occupy three full chapters in the "Lalita Vistara."

That the Christian gospels bear so close a likeness to the Buddhist may be declared by some to be entirely due to similar conditions, owing to the origin of both in the East, but on closer examination the harmony here is not merely in the many symbolical words, but the correspondence of entire narrativs is so general that the theory of undesigned coincidences cannot be entertained. Thus it is related of the Buddha that he had compared himself to the Sower who sowed the seed of the faith on the fields of the hearts of men.

Again, one of the older disciples came to the Buddha and presented himself before him as the prodigal son, by whom he was regarded as the loving father, and after he had come back again to him he was installed with much expense in the place as son and heir of the house.

One of the most striking incidents is the account in the gospel of John ix, 13, of the one "born blind," when placed in comparison with the detailed parallel passage in the Saddharma pundarika. In this sutra the idea ascribed to the master who healed the people (the blind people of the world) is that this man is presented as an example to everyone on account of his sinful condition in a former life. In the Indian phase of thought the idea of a rebirth in bodily form is the fundamental idea, but in the gospel of John the question of sin in one life being the consequence of sin in a previous life stands unique and unsupported. This case arouses the suspicion that sufficient circumspection was not used by the gospel writer in his borrowing.

A totally similar impress is contained in all the three synoptic gospels, where Jesus said that the secrets of the true doctrin of the word are hidden from the hoi polloi, but are known only to the disciples. The motiv for this teaching is clear in the Buddhist scripture, while it is an enigma in the gospels, for the Buddha distinguishes between the esoteric circle of the disciples (the Bhikshus) and the exoteric followers of the word (the Upàsakas).

It can hardly be possible that Jesus also should hav in like manner made a distinction between his disciples; but at any rate it is highly improbable that it could hav spontaneously arisen in the gospels. Again, in the Buddhist account the words occur, "Of the sun, which shines for the good and the evil; of the rain, which falls for the just and unjust:" the mustard seed serves as the simile for littleness, and the words, "Perishable is the city built of sand, which cannot maintain itself." It may also be stated here that the comparison in Matthew is incorrect about the foolish man who built his house on the sand. Houses are well known to stand strongest upon a good foundation of sand, but the Buddhist city of sand is something quite different.

COMPARING THE DOCTRINS.

Proceeding now to the comparison of the doctrins taught by Jesus and Buddha, we cannot here take credit to ourselvs for an independent and critical examination of the text, so as to affirm what was and what was not the pure, original Christianity and the primitiv teaching of the Buddha. We might certainly assume that at all events the highest moral and spiritual ideas in both teachings proceeded from the masters themselvs. And we might leave it undecided as to how far either the masters themselvs, or first the disciples and later on the dogmatic theologians, hav mixed up and confounded the esoteric fundamental ideas of the pure word with exoteric speculation and superstition. But it is easy to point out that the fundamental ideas of both teachers were the same.

The ultimate goal which Jesus pointed out to his disciples to strive for was the life eternal. As the absolute existence, only the all-one, the unchangeable, can be eternal, because without form and without shape. No material body, no difference and peculiarity of form, can be everlasting, for what is formed necessarily yields to time and must once again decay. Each appearance can be only relativ and changeable. If thus we attain to perfection and desire the life and the full satisfaction we must be delivered from our present world and all other worlds of form. Eternal peace and unchanging happiness can only mean an absolute existence. This is precisely the idea of the Buddhist goal of perfection, which is Nirvana.

And even the outward working and visible form of this striving is, in Buddhism, just the same as in the doctrin of Jesus. Love and compassion for every fellow-creature, and not merely for mankind, but for all nature generally. Such is the essential character of the doctrin of Buddha, and in the carrying out of this fundamental idea the success is more complete, better and more general, in Buddhist countries than in Christian lands with their European civilization.

I must also remark before going further another striking similarity between the two religions. Buddhism, like Christianity, is founded on a trinity. In fact, the idea of the trinity seems common to nearly all religions. In Buddhism, it consists of Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha—Buddha, the law, and the assembly of the faithful, corresponding to the father, the son, and the Holy Ghost.

HOW DID BUDDHISM REACH THE WEST?

We now come to the question, How did Buddhism reach the west? Arthur Lillie has exhausted this subject. By the early Phenicians the commerce of the east was carried across Arabia from the port of Gerrha in the Persian gulf. It was then shipped on the Red sea and carried up the Ælanitic gulf on its road to Tyre. That some of the commodities must hav come from India is proved from the fact cited by Herodotus that cassia and cinnamon were among them, which articles could not be found nearer than Ceylon or the Malabar coast. To reach Tyre these goods had to pass close to the haunts of the Essenes near the Dead sea. The Phœnicians were in contact with India at least as early as the time of Solomon; but Alexander's expedition gave a great spur to the intercourse between India and the west. Bactria and Persia were in the hands of the Seleucidan dynasty until Persia revolted.

This brought Antiochus the Great into the field to restore the authority of the Greeks. According to Polybius, he led his army into India and renewed his alliance with Sophagasenes, king of that country. As the Asoka edicts were incised on rocks some six years after Antiochus came to the throne, this is certainly an allusion to the Constantine of Buddhism. In the mean while the building of Alexandria had given a powerful fillip to the intercourse with India by sea. Alexander had designated it to be the capital of his vast empire and the bridge between India and the west. This project was ably carried out after his death by his lieutenant, the first Ptolemy. Under his wise government and that of his successor Alexandria soon became the first commercial city of the world. Of more importance even was his large tolerance of creeds, whether Egyptian, or Grecian, or Jewish. In the year 209 B.C. Ptolemy Evergetes was on the throne. He conquered Abyssinia and a greater part of Asia, including Syria, Phœnicia, Babylonia, Persia, and Media. His conquests extended to Bactria and he had a large fleet on the Red sea. his placed him in contact with India from two different directions.

He married the daughter of Magas, king of Cyrene. Macedonia was ruled by Antigone at this particular date.

INDIAN ROCK INSCRIPTIONS.

This brings us to the celebrated rock inscriptions of King Asoka, surnamed Devanampiya, the beloved of the devas, or spirits. They hav set at rest forever the question whether Buddhism was propagated westward.

On the Girnar rock, in Gugerat, the name of Antiochus the Great occurs four times. This is one passage:

> And moreover within the dominions of Antiochus, the Greek King, of which Antiochus's generals are the rulers, everywhere Piyadasi's (Asoka's) double system of medical aid is established, both medical aid for men and medical aid for animals, together with medicaments of all sorts, which are suitable for men and suitable for animals.

This is the second inscription:

> And the Greek king beside, by whom the four Greek kings Ptolemaios and Gengakenos and Megas . . . (hav been induced to permit) . . . Both here and in foreign countries everywhere (the people) follow the doctrin of the religion of Devanampiya, wheresoever it reacheth.

Now here we hav, indelibly carved in rocks still visible, a pure piece of history. It shows that the Buddhist king Asoka was closely associated with the Greeks, and that he sent missionaries to Egypt. It shows, furthermore, that at any rate he was under an impression that the Buddhist religion had been there established.

PROOF FROM THE HISTORY OF CEYLON.

One more piece of evidence I may notice here. In the "Mahawanso," an old history of Ceylon, it is announced that on the occasion of the building of the Buddhist tape of Ruanwelli enormous numbers of Buddhist monks came from all parts, including thirty thousand "from the vicinity of A'lassada, the capital of the Yona (Greek) country." In the same history is a statement that Asoka did send a missionary named Maharakkhita to Greece. A'lassada is agreed by all Orientalists to be Alexandria. The Buddhist history states that the monks came from the vicinity of Alexandria. This word, I think, is important. It was in this vicinity that convents of monks practicing rites precisely like those of the Buddhists existed in large numbers in the days of Philo (30 B.C). It may also be mentioned that Nagasena, a Buddhist, had a discussion with Menander in the capital of Syria (200 B.C.).

But even if no Buddhist came to the west, without doubt Buddhism did. For about this time there arose in Alexandria a teaching called "Gnosticism." This word is the exact Greek equivalent of "Buddhism," in Sanskrit Bŏdhi, and it simply means interior or spiritual knowledge.

MORE ROMAN AUTHORITY CITED.

Pliny says the Buddhist missionaries had settled themselvs on the shores of the Dead sea ages before his time—"per seculorum millia;" Josephus (verse 13) corroborates Pliny as to the Essenes being descendants of these missionaries. Megasthenes says that "the Jews were an Indian sect called Kalami, and their theology resembled that of the Indians."

We may here remark the analogy between Judea and Ayodya (Oude), and Palestine and Pali, and Staniland, the land of Pali.

Neander's "History of Christianity" says that "the Manichæans maintained that Jesus was a permutation of Buddha, and that Gautama, Jesus, and Mani were the same person." Dr. Lundy, in his work "Monumental Christianity," confesses the pre-Christian existence of the crucifix, the Round Tower

MAYA AND BUDDHA.

THE VIRGIN AND THE HOLY CHILD.

in Ireland, its Buddhistic character, and the penetration of Buddhistic missionaries to the remote parts of the island. C. S. Sotheran, in a lecture before the American Philological Society, remarks that legends and archæological remains prove that "Ireland, like every other nation, once listened to the propagandists of Siddartha Buddha."

Ennemoser says: "Into Egypt and the east went Herodotus, Thales, Parmenides, Empedocles, Orpheus, and Pythagoras—called Yavanacharya by the Indians—to instruct themselvs in natural philosophy and theology. Throughout the whole western American continent, south of the United States, exist traditions of a visit, centuries past, by one or more white-bearded men, dressed unlike the nativs, in long robes, who taught them religious precepts and the arts with which they were acquainted when the Spanish brigands and adventurers landed in America. It is known to scholars that the Chinese were acquainted with the continent of America in the fifth century of the Christian era."

Let us now look at a few of the coincidences found in ancient America, and hear what scholars hav to say about them.

BUDDHISM IN AMERICA.

The walls of the Thibetan temples look toward the four quarters of heaven, and each side is painted with a particular color—the north side with green, the south side with yellow, the east side with white, and the west side with red. The sacred palace of the Toltec priest-king Quetzalcoatl, in Mexico, was similarly arranged and decorated.

In Asia the elephant is the usual symbol of the Buddha; in Yucatan this animal, which is not a nativ of either of the Americas, is a frequent symbol.

"The ancient edifices of Chichen, in Central America," says Spence Hardy, "bear a striking resemblance to the tapes of India."

"In India," says Squier, "are found almost the exact counterparts of the religious structures of Central America, analogies furnishing the strongest support of the hypothesis which places the origin of the American semi-civilization in south Asia."

The great temple of Palenque, Yucatan, corresponds exactly in its principal details to that of Boro-Budor, in Java. The two planets Ragu and Ceta, the head and tail of the dragon so often spoken of in Buddhist scriptures, are drawn in full length upon the western facade of the palace at Uxmal.

History tells us that upon the robes of Wishipecocha (American for Hwuishin, Bhikshu) there were symbolic crosses. Schlagintweit states that similar crosses may be seen upon the curtains of the windows of Buddhist monasteries in Thibet.

Humboldt says that: "Thibet and Mexico present very remarkable traits of connection in their ecclesiastical hierarchy, in the number of their religious fraternities and in the extreme austerity of their penances, and in the order of their religious processions."

The high priest of Mexico bore the title of Tay-Sacca, the man of Sakya; Tay meaning man, Sacca having no meaning in the language, being merely the term which they applied to a monk. Other significant terms are Zaca-tlan, the place of Sakya; Zacatepec, the mountain of Sakya.

Vining thinks that Gautemala, the name of the Central American state, is merely a corruption of Gautama-than, the place of Gautama. I might cite many more examples showing the early influx of Buddhism into America, but these, I think, will suffice.

STATE OF ISRAEL AT CHRIST'S BIRTH.

Neander divided Israel at the date of Christ into three sections:

First—Phariseeism, the "dead theology of the letter."

Second—Sadduceeism, "debasing of the spiritual life into worldliness."

Third—Essenism, Israel mystical—"a commingling of Judaism with the old Oriental Theosophy."

The Essenes pursued an alliance with the upper world, the mystical union, or Yoga, of India. The Therapeutæ and the Essenes followed the same rules and had the same origin. Philo, writing to Hephæstion, describes them as follows:

The Therapeutæ, a sect similar to the Essenes, with whom you are acquainted, number many among them whose lives are truly exemplary. Their cells are scattered about the region bordering on the further shores of the lake Mareotis. The members of either sex liv a single and ascetic life, spending their time in fasting and contemplation, in prayer or reading. They believe themselvs favored with divine illumination—an inner light. They assemble on Sabbath for worship and listen to mystical discourses on the traditionary lore which has been handed down in secret among themselvs.

The most subtil thinker of the modern English church, the late Dean Mansel, boldly maintained that the philosophy and rites of the Therapeuts of Alexandria were due to Buddhist missionaries who visited Egypt within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great. In this he has been supported by philosophers of the caliber of Schelling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan, in his work, "Les Langues Sémitiques," also sees traces of this Buddhist propagandism in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeld, Mutter, Bohlen, King, all admit the Buddhist influence. Colebrooke saw a striking similarity between the Buddhist philosophy and that of the Pythagoreans. Dean Milman was convinced that the Therapeuts sprung from the "contemplativ and indolent fraternities" of India. I could easily multiply citations of this sort, but I think it unnecessary.

ESSENES AND THERAPEUTS.

Assisted by Philo let us draw some more points of contact between the Therapeut and the Buddhist monks:

Enforced vegetarianism, community of goods, rigid abstinence from sexual intercourse, also a high standard of purity, were common to both the Buddhists and the Therapeuts.

Neither community allowed the use of wine.

Both were strongly opposed to the blood sacrifice of the old priesthoods, etc.

From Josephus we get some additional facts relativ to these mystics: Enforced vegetarianism was one of the main principles of the Essenes as well as of the Buddhists. They refused to go to Jerusalem to the temple sacrifices at the risk of being stoned. The Essenes had a Sanhedrim of Justice like the Buddhist Sangha. Excommunication in both was the chief punishment. This was altogether foreign to the lower Mosaism, which allowed no Jew to escape the obligations of the Jewish law.

The Essenes, like the Buddhists, forbada slavery, war, revenge, avarice, hatred, worldly longings, etc.

THE NAZARENES.

Before proceeding further we must consider the term Nazarene or Nazarite. Christ, in the inscription on the cross, was called "The Nazarite" (o Nazaraio) (Luke iv, 31). The church of Jerusalem was called the Church of the Nazarenes or Nazarites. It is the only name for Christians mentioned in the Acts. The followers of John the Baptist were called Nazarites or Nazarenes, and they still exist and are called Nazarenes to this day.

The Essenes, according to Epiphanius, were called Nazarines or Nazareans. Now we find that John the Baptist was a Nazarite or Essene. He used the rite of baptism, which was peculiar to the Essenes. He ordered a partition of clothing and necessaries. He abstained from wine and "soft raiment." He strongly assailed the Pharisees and Sadducees; that is, all Israel except the Essenes. They rejected his baptism and accused him of demonology, the favorit indictment of anti-mystical Israel against mystical Israel. Moreover, the Baptist is said to hav reached the hight or crowning Essene state of spiritual advancement, the spirit and power of Elias.

JESUS AN ESSENE.

Another point is of the highest importance—the scene of his ministry was the stony wilderness, the arid mountain region that stretches from Jerusalem to the Quarantania mountain and from the Quarantania to En-Gedi. Now this, according to Pliny the Elder, was the very spot where the bulk of the Essenes was to be found. Their numbers in his day, the very commencement of the Christian era, were enormous. Josephus fixes their number at four thousand souls. We learn of John, too, that his followers were multitudes—in fact, a whole "people prepared for the Lord." We now come to the adult Jesus. The first prominent fact of his life is his baptism by John the Essene. The full meaning of this may be learned from Josephus, who says:

> To one that aims at entering their sect, admission is not immediate, but he remains a whole year outside it, and is subjected to their rule of life, being invested with an ax, the girdle aforesaid and a white garment. Provided that over this space of time he has given proof of his perseverance he approaches nearer to their course of life and partakes of the holier waters of cleansing, but he is not admitted to their community of life. Following the proof of his strength of control, his moral conduct is tested for two years more, and when he has made clear his worthiness he is thus adjudged to be of their number. But before he touches the common meal he pledges himself in oath to make one shudder; first, that he will reverence the divine being, and, secondly, that he will abide in justice unto men, and will injure no one, either of his own accord or by command, but will always detest the iniquitous and strive on the side of the righteous.

Now if, as is so widely believed, the chief object of Christ's mission was to establish forever the Mosaism of the bloody altar and combat the main teaching of the asketes, or mystics, which postulates the principle of the malignity of matter, why did he go to an askete, or Essene, to be baptized? Whether or not Christ belonged to mystical Israel, there can be no discussion about the Baptist. He was a Nazarite "separated from his mother's womb" who had induced a whole "people" to come out to the desert and adopt the Essene rites and their community of goods. And we see from a comparison of the Essene and early Christian initiation what such baptism carried with it. It implied preliminary instruction and vows of implicit obedience to the instructor.

BUDDHISM NOT PLAGIARISM.

I hav already shown in my parallelism between the lives of Christ and Buddha that the latter had also his baptism, fasting, and temptation.

We see, therefore, that the seed of Eastern wisdom had been transported to Greece, Egypt, and Palestine many years before the advent of Christ, and this confirms what I said at the commencement—that the New Testament must certainly be of Indian origin. Many resemblances in certain points might, indeed, hav arisen independently on both sides, but in no case could it hav been so universal.

The theory of a derivation of the Buddhist narrativs from the Christian evangelists is wholly and completely negatived—first, by the argument of date, and again by that of internal evidence.

Lastly, the comparison of the traditions on both sides strengthens the argument, from the nature and character of the similarity.

It is admitted that the priority of the Buddhist scriptures has been established quite beyond a doubt, as the result of the researches of Professor Seydel and others. The canon of Buddhism has the advantage over the gospels not only in its original source by five hundred years, which the Buddha lived before Christ, but also in that it was already in its present and indeed in its now traditional form even before the beginning of the Christian era.

ORIGIN OF THE TWO SCRIPTURES

But the origin of the gospels of the New Testament canon dates, if not from the early part of the second, at all events from the latter half of the first century. The solution of the problem of the coincidences depends thus upon the inquiry into the nature of the origin of the Christian gospels.

But here still another inquiry naturally follows for consideration which ought not to be carelessly passed by in working out our proposition. We mean the parallel passages of the first three (synoptic) gospels—a coincidence as to contents and as to form which is so general that very often in the translation there are quite a large number of similar sayings from the same Greek words—so that the use either of an independent, or interdependent, or that of a common original document must be unavoidably accepted.

That the present four canonical gospels are poetical compositions and later compilations of original subjects is not disputed at the present day by those who hav inquired into the matter. By this, indeed, the synoptical problem is not solved, but that matter depends on this. For in the present position of this question the following is accepted as correct:

The author of the gospel of Luke had by him for reference the gospel of Mark and of Matthew. But of these two in their present canonical form the gospel of Mark is certainly the earlier work. However, the author of the canonical gospel of Mark was acquainted with the original manuscripts of the apostle Matthew, which later on were compiled by another hand into the present gospel according to Matthew.

A QUESTION OF DATES.

As to the question of dates of composition of the canonical gospels the following are received as the most probable: Matthew later than 70 A.C., Mark before 70 A.C., Luke and John later than 100 A.C. But with all this the synoptical question is still merely formal, and by no means has the complete answer been given, for the main difficulty in this problem assuredly lies in the two points of view wherein this is finally connected with the Buddhist problem, namely:

Since it is clear that so much is mere matter of tradition as regards the supposed original notes of Matthew, and as frequent coincidences occur in the gospels, is it not possible that they were derived from Buddhist sources?

Since it is clear that these interpolations which gathered round the person of Jesus were not historical events, but abundantly bore a mythical or mystical character even up to the time of the compilation of the canonical gospels, as also for a few centuries after the death of Jesus, is it not possible that they were fixed as the truths of Christ in the belief of the evangelists and their circle of religious followers?

In reply to the first question we hav amply shown in the first part of this lecture the spread of the Buddhist doctrins to the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. It is not doubted at the present day that Indian religious ideas, and, indeed, more particularly those of Buddhism, reached and were even propagated as far as Egypt, Asia Minor, and Palestine long before the Christian era.

From what has been gathered about the intercourse between India and the west there is sufficient evidence to establish this point. One has only to reflect carefully about the missionary zeal of the Buddhists, whose existence was due to the very cosmopolitanism of their faith and to the missionary commission handed down by their master from the earliest age, in order to find it wholly inconceivable that only traders and the envoys of princes, but not missionaries, should hav availed themselvs of the strongly built ships and the inhabited highways which served many years for the busiest commerce between India and Ceylon and the Roman empire.

SUMMING IT UP.

But if the seed of eastern wisdom has been transported to the west many years before the advent of Christ it was given to him to prepare the right ground for this seed of the "Light of Asia" and to make it fruitful by his teachings and his life, pushing the sacrifice so far as to besprinkle it with his own blood. Not only did Jesus fulfill every precept of the wisdom—religion—of Sakya-Muni, but he even fulfilled the prophecy of the Buddha, who on several occasions foretold that five hundred years after his death, when mankind would be in need of a savior, would appear the Maitreya Buddha—that is to say, the Buddha of compassionate love. Was not Jesus the pitiful, the compassionate, the Maitreya that the Buddha foresaw?

With Jesus, a historical character, sublime, beyond all previous western experience, appeared in the world. He gave it laws and rights and newer and greater conceptions of life. He told the Hebrew that forgivness was more noble than retaliation, poverty than riches, the ignominy of the gibbet in the cause of enlightenment than crowns of gold. He announced to the death-dealing zealot that even in the presence of outrage and treachery it was better to sheathe than to draw the sword. He taught that to perform such menial offices as feet-washing was more godlike than to accept them.

The scheme of Jesus was to slowly leaven the world by means of a secret society of mystics rigorously winnowed by beggary, celibacy, hunger, or persecution.

A sublime spectacle is the historical Jesus standing among the gray limestone hills of Palestine and planning his great battle.

In one army were a few beggars, naked, shoeless, with no shelter but the caves of the foxes; no protector except the mephitic air that depopulates the shores of the Dead sea. In the other army were the cruel Pharisees, the inhuman priesthood of Jehovah, backed by the invincible legions of Cæsar.

A sublime spectacle, also, is that of Buddha abandoning his throne, his beloved wife, his aged father, his youthful son—bidding an eternal farewell to all the luxuries and comforts of a regal court to go and lead a life of misery and privation out of pure love for suffering and ignorant mankind.

The names of Buddha and Christ shine with undazzled splendor in the history of mankind. The creed mongers who hav distorted the teachings of Jesus cannot diminish his grand figure, itself a shadow of the Eastern sage—of the gentle, loving Buddha.

Both sought to relieve the sufferings of their fellowmen by showing them the only way to happiness—that is, the destruction of selfishness and the development of pure love for man and beast; the great doctrin of universal brotherhood which we find so often on men's lips and so seldom in their hearts.

The Demand for the New Leaflet.

The demand for the Flag and Pansy leaflet is a growing one. Not only are our own people pleased with it, and sending in requests for it in quantity, but strangers who catch stray glimpses of it write us to know about the society, or to ask for those leaflets and other pamphlets. Each day brings in more and more of these testimonies of the good work which this little leaflet is doing.

This is, of course, very gratifying to the board of directors, and especially to the executiv committee upon whom the burden of the management falls. We are interesting the public as never before in the American Secular Union, and appealing forcibly to their patriotism and their desire to uphold the public school system. But we do not wish to claim all the credit of this circular for ourselvs. The idea originated in that wide-awake little town of Portsmouth, O., in the activ brain of that stanch worker for the cause, W. S. Andres; and although we hav, of necessity, departed considerably from the circular as at first outlined by him, and although we ourselvs hav spent a good deal of time and labor upon it, it is to him that the credit of the first suggestion is due, and whatever patriotism is expressed therein was original with him. Let us rejoice that we hav in our ranks this helpful and faithful worker for the cause!

And now, dear friends, I want to talk with you a little about getting these leaflets still more widely distributed. When we first sent them out, some division of opinion prevailed in our executiv committee as to the wisdom of charging you enough to cover the cost and leave a small margin for postage and free distribution to others. We finally agreed to let those who wanted to buy them hav these leaflets at thirty five cents per dozen or three dozen for a dollar. But we hav since come to realize that it would hav been wiser to charge you forty cents per dozen, or five cents apiece. This also would be a great convenience to us in sending them to those of our friends who want only one or two, or who want them by tens or twenty-fives. As you know, colors are more expensiv than black ink; but, on the other hand, we feel that the added attractivness of this leaflet more than balances the extra outlay. People who are overwhelmed with the usual run of circulars will take a second look at this one, before throwing it into the waste-basket; and that second look usually results in their saving it up "for a little while," at any rate. It is too pretty a thing to be consigned to the waste-basket, after all. Then, too, every true patriot has a regard for his flag which will lead him to treasure up this gay little circular for the sake of the pictured banner on the first page; while the pansy on the last page appeals to the Freethinker, whatever his individual preferance regarding badges.

Now, we want to see these leaflets still more freely circulated. And we think it necessary that we make the price as given above—five cents each, or forty cents per dozen. But as we want to be perfectly fair to those who may be planning to purchase some at the old price within the next week or two, we will do as follows:

Those orders reaching us not later than April 30th will be filled at the old rate—thirty-five cents per dozen, or three dozen for one dollar. Those reaching us after April 30th will be filled at the rate of five cents apiece, or forty cents per dozen. This will giv time for the Liberal papers containing this notice to find their way to remote towns, and for any orders to reach us by the required date, so that we shall be perfectly fair to all our people in this matter.

Now, dear friends, this is a small outlay on your part for missionary pamphlets, even at the new rate; and remember that the old rate holds good for all orders reaching us by April 30th. These pamphlets you can use anywhere, among people of any theological belief; and, when you hav thus interested your neighbor, by means of this leaflet, in our demand for freedom of thought, you will hav an entering wedge for whatever phase of Liberalism you desire to present to him, and you will find him favorably disposed to listen to your words.

The Flag and Pansy pamphlets, in short, ought to be freely purchased and circulated by Freethinkers; and we hope that we shall continue to receive orders from you for these in quantity, at the new rate of five cents each, or forty cents per dozen.

The Torch of Reason vs. The Pansy.

Under the above caption I noticed an article in your issue of March 21st calling for remarks or suggestions touching the question of a suitable emblem for Freethinkers, in answer to which I respectfully submit a few points for consideration.

First, the "pansy" as an emblem for Freethinkers is not only absurd, but ridiculous. These expressions I use in their fullest sense. Viola tricolor, a variety of violet, whose language is "modesty," to become an emblem for bold, courageous, defiant Freethinkers! How perfectly absurd! Reason and revelation might with equal consistency clasp hands, the lion and lamb lie down together and look for the millennium, which would be certainly near at hand.

Just imagin Bruno, Galileo, Servetus, Thomas Paine, Howard McQueary, R. G. Ingersoll, Hugh O. Pentecost, with many others whose names I might mention, destroyers of those things and of that held and cherished by many in the orthodox world as being most sacred—demolishers of idols, destroyers of faiths, God-killers—wearing the "heartsease!" Is it not ridiculous? Possibly an appropriate emblem for a sentimental school girl of seventeen, a love-sick dude, or a puling old maid.

The shape of the flower certainly does not recommend it. In the professional florist's eye a well-shaped pansy flower in outline should form a circle, with no irregularities or segments upon its edge, very unlike the miserable, degenerated representation of the flower I hav seen on some of the American Secular Union's business sheets. If we are to hav a symbol, it should be perfect in design as well as symbolic, whether we approximate to it or not.

The torch as an emblem, aside from its ability and use in a past age as a means of shedding light, has even less to recommend it—stiff and ungraceful in outline; suggestiv of moans and groans, of London fogs, of burning pitch and tar, to those who may hav followed in its smoky wake and paid a small fee to be piloted from street to street, as has been the experience of the writer, or as when applied to the funeral pyre, or a pile of fagots to dispose of what were called heretics in a barbaric and bygone age. Is there anything poetical about such reminiscences? Anything pleasant or sublime for the imaginativ or reflectiv mind to disport and revel in? I think not. It does not typify, and is not at all in keeping with, the present advanced age of science and means of shedding light. Would the old stage-coach be a good representation of a vehicle for this age as a means in which to travel? I think you will say, No. These are points not to be overlooked.

Acting on your suggestion, allow me to propose a flower that I think has some features of recommendation in it—the "dandelion" (Leontodon), meaning lion and tooth. Dandelion is derived from the French dent de-lion, an appellation given on account of the tooth-like lobes of the leaves—a flower found in every clime where flowers grow; a flower whose color resembles that of our golden orb of day, the source of light, heat, and life; a flower whose very outline is clearly suggestiv of light, heat, each petal being, as it were, a point or ray, going out from and encircling its whole disk, the latter not being simply one individual flower, but many flowers, as is the case in the whole order (Compositæ) to which its belongs. It is, therefore, cosmopolitan in its character; perennial in nature; will liv and thrive under conditions where your pansy would dwindle and die, under the snow where your torch would go out; a flower not used by any nation as an emblem in so far as I know.

In the above we hav a flower whose meaning bears significance, at once suggestiv of the fearless and brave, about which historically or otherwise there is not even a smack of mawkish sentimentalism or superstition. I venture the assertion that no Freethinker will deny that in the present, as in the past, energy, fearlessness, and courage are essentials in the conflict now going on for the enthroning of reason and in attacking the citadels of superstition.

Here is a flower in which the imagination of the poet, the reflectiv and searching powers of the sage, the vivacious fancies of the school-girl, and the prudish whims of the old maid, may each find an ample field in which their sentiments may find expression and their fertil minds revel and delight; something that typifies a man, whom no theologian dares meet in open combat, when reason is wielded as a weapon of defense, whose stentorian tones are a menace to all weaklings, and whose very impress signifies victory.

In designing such an emblem there is large scope for talent and taste. The lion is, to me, suggestiv and appropriate. The monarch of the forest, like the mind of the Freethinker, loves and craves freedom; while an aggressiv animal, combativ and ferocious, under certain conditions the reverse.

With a flower in its paw, or lying in a bed of the same, with head erect, and its eagle eyes (diamonds) scanning the horizon, are forms that readily suggest themselvs. Should the subject be considered as worthy of adoption, I hav other suggestions to make.

Chicago Jottings.

That the Roman hierarchy are organizing with renewed vigor for another raid on the county treasury is easily seen from the items in the daily press. The cross-backs will not find it quite so easy, as several quasi-Protestant institutions hav been inaugurated since the decision by the supreme court, and they desire to gather in the shekels for their non-sectarian religious institutions and the glory of God. The News of March 26th says:

The committee appointed by the county board to investigate the sectarian character, if such should exist, of the four great industrial schools of the county, is still wrangling and seemingly as far from a decision as ever.

A secret meeting was held last night, but no action was taken. A report was prepared and submitted, but one section was considered objectionable. It was as follows:

"Your committee is of the opinion that it is contrary to sound public policy to expend public money in aid of private enterprises, charitable or otherwise, and therefore recommend that contracts be not entered into with the industrial schools mentioned in this report."

The general impression of the committeemen is said to be that the Chicago School for Girls and the St. Mary's School for Boys are under sectarian influences. The Glenwood School for Boys and the Evanston School for Girls are generally conceded to be non-sectarian. The committee seems to feel its inability to decide the question and to wish to refer the matter to the courts. Messrs. Cool and Stauber demand the passage of the foregoing section. Brandt, Green, and Nelson are favorable to giving money to the schools. Mr. Green says he is opposed to a fine drawing of lines.

Following the lead of Massachusetts, California, and Ohio, whose several legislatures hav before them bills for the persecution of Spiritualists of the most outrageous character, some idiotic law-makers of Illinois are trying to immortalize themselvs by a similar piece of petty persecution. The one introduced in the Illinois legislature by Senator Thomas, of Cook, is said to be aimed at "bogus séances," but as the bill reads, to my mind, it would include the lectures of Mrs. Richmond or anyone else who is alleged to be under control, as it makes it a misdemeanor to "impersonate the spirit of any deceased person." Here is the full text of the bill:

Every person who, for profit or gain, or in anticipation thereof, for the purpose of presenting any Spiritualistic materialization, shall impersonate the spirit of any deceased person, or by any trick, device, or mechanical contrivance shall present anything representing the spirit of any deceased person, shall be guilty of misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined a sum of not less than $100 nor more than $300 for each such offense; or shall be imprisoned in the county jail not less than three nor more than six months; or in the discretion of the court, both such fine and imprisonment may be imposed. Provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to any theatrical performance.

If the provisions of the bill were only operativ against "bogus séances," it might meet with approbation from even Spiritualists, although if people want to be humbugged by frauds I don't know why the ministerial fraud should go scot-free. The Bible certainly makes a good basis for Spiritualistic operations. That is one reason the writer was never a convert to the angel-world wonders.

A FIVE POINTED POLITICAL FIGHT.

The World's Fair city is well supplied with candidates for the mayoralty, there being no less than five Richmonds in the field.

Since the newly acquired territory has been added Chicago is politically pretty close, but the present muddle places it beyond the ken of the most astute party strategist to figure out a majority for his favorit. As America is looking Chicagoward, the majority doubtless would like to know what sort of a mayor we are to hav. I will briefly giv my impressions of the candidates.

Hempstead Washburn, Republican, is noted as the son of his father. His father was noted for wealth and was appointed by Grant minister to France. There this Republican misrepresentativ never protested against the diabolical butcheries of those who merely demanded local self-government—not that alone, but he absolutely justified it. This American imperialist has loaned the Art Institute his collection of paintings, which include such portraits as Bismarck and King William, which shows the idols he would worship. Hempstead is a harmless nonentity. He married a Catholic, and his wife, backed by the priests, would be boss.

There is a sort of "twins" about these Washburnes. The Citizens' Association, who, regardless of party, desire a business administration, hav nominated Elmer Washburne. It is whispered on the quiet that he does not lean to Romanism and is opposed to the Irish holding all the offices. He was once chief of police and is said to hav left a good record. Since, he has been superintendent of a penitentiary; and his business career has been so checkered that he can hardly be considered a howling success. The ministerial party are "backing" the citizens' nominee and want every gambling-house closed, and, worst of all, the World's Fair—if it is ever completed—closed on Sunday. For that reason it would be too bad to spoil so very nice a gentleman by so trying a position.

The present incumbent, by virtue of the bulldozing of the police and the assiduous labors of the bread-and-butter brigade, secured the nomination of the democratic convention, notwithstanding that his political patron and godfather, Carter H. Harrison, was in training for the race. Bad as Carter was, Cregier has made about the worst mayor we could possibly hav.

Cartor H. Harrison is a brilliant, boastful man of splendid executiv ability. Personally he is financially honest, but politically he is an unconscionable demagog—the appointer, during his eight years' administration, of the worst class of ward heelers, bums, thugs, and pimps. This time this very "gang" has been captured by the seductiv DeWitt C. Cregier, the present incumbent, and Carter H. has only secured the nomination of the Personal Rights League. That organization has done some excellent work in the past, but its present incongruous attitude in this campaign compels the conclusion that it has abandoned its reform attitude for the brewers and boodle. I should not be surprised if this was the beginning of its downfall.

Cregier, by the most rascally outrages, has secured the "regular" Democratic nomination and the support of the Clan-na Gaels, while Carter has to content himself with a divided house and a few German organizations. It is proposed to read Carter Harrison and his supporters out of the Democratic party. Cregier feels so weak that he has implored Senator Palmer to come and help him. If the senator does Illinois will in future be lost to the Democracy.

Then comes the Socialistic candidate, Thomas J. Morgan, or "Tommy" Morgan, as the papers sneeringly term him. The political sheets villify him worse than anyone in the city. They recognize his honesty and ability and fear him. When the newspapers palaver a labor reformer I think it is best to keep a sharp lookout for him. Intellectually Morgan leads all the rest, not excepting Harrison—but that is intellect pure and simple, for he has little of the polish of education. He is a countryman of Bradlaugh's and has that sturdy stubbornness that defies all obstacles. The political hacks who wish to trade on their influence in their unions for boodle hav a sorry time of it when Morgan is around. His resolutions on all conceivable subjects stamp him as the most important public educator in Chicago. He could neither be bribed nor bulldozed. He is an avalanche of industrial information and every inch a moral man. He works at the bench as a brass finisher every weekday, and, strange to say, is the sort of reformer who can earn a good living for himself. He has some royalties on patents which the railroad companies pay him. He does not expect to be elected, but a vote for him is an indorsement of the most admirable city platform ever proposed.

When I went to register I encountered about the same trouble that Eugene did in New York city. I refused to be sworn, to take off my hat or hold up my hand. The regular judge refused to take my deposition, but I stuck to my position and "got there just the same." I intended to send the entire colloquy, but think the above more important.

Religion.

Religion is considered by many persons to be a very important thing to hav. It is said to be the groundwork of usefulness and the foundation of endless happiness. Books hav been written to prove that no morality is possible without it; and it is generally agreed among all religionists that access to the elysian fields depends on implicit faith in their dogmas, although no two of them agree in informing us of what the dogmas essential to salvation consist.

We find the word "religion" used only three times in the Bible; and in each case it is translated from the Greek word threskos, which means nothing more than outward religious ceremony. There seems to be no evidence tending to show that the practice of religion meant anything more in those days than the performance of outward ceremonies. The very performance of these, however, implied faith in their efficacy, and therefore faith in the dogmas on which they were built.

The word "religion," in the Latin tongue religio, is similar to the other Latin noun religatio, which means, binding or tying to anything; and both words come from the word religo, to bind back, to fasten, tie. So that the primary and essential meaning of the word "religion" seems to be, to rebind or fasten back a person by forms and ceremonies, to something from which, except for the influence of cords and ropes, he would be likely to break, wander, or be carried away.

It having been satisfactorily proved to all who read science and history, that the religions of all nations hav been spontaneously evolved from the hallucinations of dreams and disordered minds, and the superstitious fears of the ignorant savages with whom they originated; and the different forms of religion found in different parts of the world being, to every enlightened mind, self-evidently only the marks of the various degrees or stages of progress to which the devotees thereof hav attained in intellectual development, our minds can no longer honestly evade the questions: Why should any man who believes in human progress desire to be tied back to the dogmas of a barbarian past? Why should the human mind, which, unfettered, delights to soar like the eagle to sublimer hights whence its view becomes enlarged and ennobled, be chained down to something degrading, unsuited to its present needs, and incredible even when allegorized and distorted?

Originally, the Hebrew or Jewish word for God was Aleim, which means, the curser; and this shows that, like other nations, their first gods were evil beings. The word Alemath, hiding-place, shows this word in part retained after its malign signification had practically disappeared. Elohim is another signification of the original word Aleim; and, being in the plural form in Gen. i, 1, givs us to understand that "in the beginning the gods created the heaven and the earth." Also, in verse 26 we are told that the "gods said, Let us make man in our image," showing that polytheism had also been a stage of the Hebrew religion.

In Ex. iv, 14; Num. xxii, 22; Josh. vii, 1; Job ix, 5, 13; Ps. xc, 7, and many other places where the Lord God of Israel is said to hav been angry, the word for anger is aph, which means anger, snorting, i.e., it represents Jehovah as being "snorting mad."

David tells us (Ps. vii, 11) that "God is angry [" snorting mad"] with the wicked every day;" and God is said to hav been very angry with Solomon (1 Kings xi, 9), with Aaron (Deut. ix, 20), and with Israel (2 Kings xvii, 18); but the different inspired writers are not agreed as to the propriety of men imitating Jehovah in this respect. Solomon thinks it would not be wise to do so, since "anger resteth in the bosom of fools" (Eccles. vii, 9); and Paul exhorts his brethren (Eph. iv, 31; Col. iii, 8) to put away this godlike trait; but Jesus is said to hav been like his heavenly father in this respect, for he looked upon his adversaries with anger (Mark iii, 5), and Paul, on second thought, deemed it best to exhort Christians to be angry (Eph. iv, 26), provided they did not sin. But even if it was no sin to be angry, it was acting the fool, according to Solomon, and such divine imitations ought therefore to be let alone. Since religion is founded upon the idea of a personal God, it would seem, to those who reason in a common-sense way, as though the said God ought to manifest himself to somebody in some way, or else "forever after hold his peace."

But the fact is, we hav no proof that any man ever saw, heard, felt, tasted, or smelled this aforesaid God —in short, he has never revealed himself to any one of the five senses, nor has he ever bestowed upon man a sixth sense so as to make the said man aware of the fact. How a God who keeps himself thus everlastingly concealed can expect any sensible person to believe in him, is more than I can understand. How Christianists expect us to hav a godly "zeal according to knowledge," when all knowledge of God is withheld from us?

True, that Moses talked face to face with the Lord, as a man talketh with his friend; but Moses, in his egotism, must hav stretched the blanket considerably in this matter, for God expressly said, "Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me and liv" (Ex. xxxiii, 20).

Jacob also said, "I hav seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii, 30). But this was not the first lie Jacob ever told. Jesus was very doubtful about the manhood of both Jacob and Moses. He says, "No man hath seen God at any time." According to this, Jacob must hav had little of the man about him; or, as we often say, he was "no man at all," and Moses was a good second.

So it seems that there exists no good reason why we should submit to the operation of being "tied back" with ropes and chains to the mythical dogmas of the past, or be put into a straitjacket to keep us quiet. Let them clip our wings if they can.

Death of Antichrist.

Not of him who signs himself "Antichrist" in the Freethought papers; he still livs, and is now penning this obituary.

Several years ago a little pamphlet was issued by the Rev. M. Baxter, from the office of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, entitled, "The Great Crisis at Hand." In it the author tells us that "Antichrist will be a Napoleon;" that the name Napoleon is derived from the Greek Apollyon, that is from the Greek aorist Apoleon (Rev. ix, 11); and that taking the Greek word Napoleonti, and giving to each letter its numerical value, it foots up 666, the number of the beast with the seven heads and ten horns, described in the Apocalypse.

"More than fifty clergymen and fifty laymen," says Mr. Baxter, "hav shown in their treatises that the Napoleon dynasty became in 1806 the seventh governmental headship of the Roman empire—the seventh head that continued but a short space, until 1815, when it was 'wounded to death' by the sword at Waterloo; but it yet shall be healed and reëstablished over France and Europe, and become more powerful than even in the time of the first Napoleon, and again possess military occupation of Rome and restore the temporal power of the pope."

Looking, therefore, for the "Man of Sin" in the Napoleonic dynasty, Mr. Baxter, as early as 1873, decided that though the number 666 was contained in the name Prince Louis Napoleon, yet that young prince, then seventeen years old, was lacking in the character described by Daniel, namely, "a king of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences," and "a vile person." But furthermore, Prince Louis was killed in the Zulu war in 1879, as noted in the later editions of "The Great Crisis at Hand," in which the author proceeds to discover and point out the coming "Man of Sin," as follows:

It will remain to be seen whether some Napoleon, who is more of a fierce countenance and a vile person, does not after some time take his place.

But Prince Jerome Napoleon, who was born in 1823, seems the most likely of the Bonapartes to become the Personal Antichrist. He alone, of all of them, is a man "of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences," i.e., of defiant aspect and of great sagacity, and also a "vile person," notoriously ridiculed and vilified, and a Voltairian Infidel and democrat, all of which the Antichrist is predicted to be in Dan. viii, 23; xi. 21, 36, 37. He has also been nicknamed in France the Red Prince, because of his Red-Republican political views. The Antichrist's ten-kingdomed confederacy is, in its later stage, represented as a scarlet-colored, or Red Republicanized ten-horned wild beast in Rev. xvii, when Bonapartism, Red-Republicanism, and Romanism will coalesce.

This Prince Paul Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte's face is the very image of the first Napoleon Bonaparte's, and the fatal number 666 is discovered in the Greek nominativ for P. Jerome Napoleon.

Also, 666 is the sum total of the letters of the name P. Jerome Bonaparte in Hebrew, as follows:

Pe, 80; Gimel, 3; Resh, 200; Aleph, 1; Mem, 40; Beth, 2; Aleph, 1; Nun, 50; Pe, 80; Resh, 200; Teth, 9; total, 666.

Mr. Baxter does not explain why he contrasts Paul to P, nor why he ends Jerome's name in Greek with an e, making it phonetically Jerom*ee*. But the omission of that e would hav made the number too small by five, and the addition of aul to the first initial, P, would hav made the number 431 too many. In expounding the prophecies you must always fit the fulfillment to the prediction, even if you hav to pervert both.

But further, Jerome was not the name of the aforesaid prince, who died at Rome March 17, 1891. The prince's father was Jerome Bonaparte, a brother of the emperor Napoleon Bonaparte. The real name of the prince was Napoleon Joseph Charles Paul Bonaparte, though he was better but incorrectly known as Jerome Napoleon, and still better by the nickname of Plon-Plon.

With this correction, what becomes of the Napoleonic Antichrist? It is impossible to produce, out of the letters of the prince's real name, the number of the beast, 666. Change the Roman letters to Greek and the result is as follows:

Napoleon, 356; Joseph, 785; Charles (with the initial Chi), 941; Paul, 511; Bonapart (without the silent terminal e), 604; total, 3,197.

And if you take the nickname Plon-Plon, it foots up only 480.

And now what will the prophetic calculator do? Will he find another Antichrist in the Napoleonic dynasty? Victor, the eldest son of the deceased prince, has been disinherited, and the pretensions of the Bonaparte family are vested by will in the younger son Louis. But neither of the son's names will answer; Victor counts 900 and Louis 710.

Might we here suggest a search for the prophetic number among the American Bonapartes, through Jerome's first wife, Miss Patterson of Baltimore, whom he had to repudiate at the command of his brother, the emperor, because she was not a princess?

But it is needless to make this or any other suggestion to Mr. Baxter, now that his Antichrist is dead without having fulfilled the prophecies in regard to the seven-headed and ten-horned monster, nor does there appear to be time enough for these fulfillments before the second coming of Christ, which Mr. Baxter has fixed about the year 1900, or a little sooner, when all of us are to be either in heaven or hell.

The beast of the Apocalypse has been the subject of a vast amount of useless study by religious dupes. Some hav believed that the number of the beast indicated the year 666 of the Christian era—which era, by the way, was not thought of until the early part of the sixth century. Others, with more rational notions, having ascertained that the Apocalypse was probably written about A D 68 or 69, just after the death of Nero, hav professed to find the number of the beast in the name of Nero Cæsar, spelled with Hebrew letters.

And now, for the edification of Adventists and other cranks, whether Christians or skeptics, the "Man of Sin" who writes this obituary of a bogus Antichrist will submit a solution of the problem which is entitled to grave consideration from its antiquity.

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has translated what he calls the Second Toldoth Jeshu, a Hebrew document brought to light in 1705 by Huldrich. It givs a full account of the life and death of Jesus, son of Mary, by Joseph Pandira. An uncle of Jesus, named Simon Ben Kalphus (answering to Simon Kepha in the first Toldoth Jeshu), having procured the incommunicable name (Shem Hamphoras), wrought signs and wonders just as Jesus had done. Having by this means become a leader of the sect, he sat on a tower and wrote commandments. The narrativ then proceeds:

And Simon composed for the deception of the people of Ai lying books, and he called them "Avonkelajon" (Evangelium). . . . He also wrote books in the name of the disciples of Jesus, and especially in that of Johannes (John), and said that Jeshu had given them these.

But with special purpose he composed the book of Johannes (the Apocalypse); for the men of Ai thought it contained mysteries, whereas it contained pure invention. For instance, he wrote in the book of Johannes that Johannes saw a beast with seven heads and seven (ten) horns and seven crowns, and the name of the beast was blasphemy and the number of the beast was 666. Now the seven heads mean the seven letters which compose the words "Jeshu of Nazareth." And in like manner the number 666 is that which is the sum of the letters composing his name.

Mr. Baring-Gould has not given the seven Hebrew letters answering to "Jesus of Nazareth," but the "Man of Sin" has ascertained them. Their English equivalent is Jeshu Natzr, and the names and numerical value of the Hebrew letters are, Yod, 10; Shin, 300; Vau, 6; Nun, 50; Yod, 10; Tsaddi, 90; Resh, 200; total, 666.

The authenticity or great antiquity of this document we will not pretend to vouch for; but it is perhaps about as truthful as any of the rest concerning Christ and Christianity, and it purports to hav been written by Rabbi Jochanun, son of Saccai, in Jerusalem (see Rev. of Ant., pp. 394–413).

It is said that Plon-Plon was a profligate; but we opine that his moral character was at least on a level with the average princes. He had a head full of brains, was a born orator, a brilliant writer, and, in the judgment of some competent critics, one of the greatest statesmen in Europe. He was doubtless a "Voltairian Infidel," as characterized by Mr. Baxter, and yet, like Voltaire, he died a nominal Catholic. "Church and throne," says the London Times, "disputed for possession of the body, which each desired to convert into a trophy. . . . Each had recourse to lying in order to simulate success. The confessors, cardinals, nuns, and other religious people hav shown a willingness to revive all the horrors of the Middle Ages. The only one who leaves the horrible deathbed scene with a higher reputation is the prince himself, who preserved intact his force of will to die as he had lived, with a horror of counterfeit in his soul and with contempt for hypocrits on his lips."

Legislation versus Supreme Law.

In all the talk about the persecution of Harman, Heywood, and others, no one suggests that the United States courts hav no power under the Constitution of the United States to punish for any offenses except treason, piracy, felony on seas, counterfeiting coin, etc.; offenses against laws of nations and those committed in territories of the United States. The debates on the Constitution show that the founders so intended, and the Constitution in express words declares that powers not given are reserved.

Congress tried to punish sedition, and frauds on United States banks. Jefferson and Madison protested, and declared that the Constitution givs Congress power to punish the above-named offenses and no other offenses whatsoever, and that therefore the acts to punish sedition and frauds on banks and all others save those named are null, void, and of no effect. Congress abandoned the attempt. Now, "if any man knew the Constitution it was Madison," as Daniel Webster said. That instrument has never been changed in that point. And what is the excuse for this violation? for this highest crime known to human law? for surely, under our modern constitutional governments, a deliberate violation of that supreme law is treason, murder, civil war combined, because these all follow in the wake of the arch crime. And every court, every judge, enforcing these violations is guilty of atrocious crime. It is as plain as twice two makes four. No one can even deny it. The excuse is, the state must hav power to punish violators of its laws! That is, the state or nation must hav power to do what it has neither power nor right to do by the very law of its own being; to do what its creators deliberately declared, after long debate, it never should do.

The history of the whole thing shows that we hav not advanced one step as intelligent, liberty-loving freemen, but are just as ready to creep and fawn before usurped power as were the people of Rome two thousand years ago. Judges, jurors, and prosecutors ought to refuse to sit in cases of the kind. HOLT.

Woman Suffrage.

Fiat justitia ruat celum.

Justice does not in itself embrace only a single idea; and acts in themselvs, apparently right and proper, may, when considered in their effects and results, taking into account the attending circumstances, be very improper and unjust. And, vice versa, acts which, under ordinary circumstances, are very improper and unjust, may, under other circumstances, be in the highest degree proper and just. For instance, in the great fire in New York city (I believe in 1836), when so cold that the fire engins were useless, and the wind high, causing the fire to rapidly sweep everything before it, the people went some distance before the destroying element, and putting barrels of powder into buildings, blew them out of the way, and thus saved a great portion of the city.

Now, we cheerfully acknowledge that many women are as well qualified—nay, better qualified—to properly exercise and enjoy the right of suffrage, than the majority of male voters. And further, they are equally as true friends of a genuin republican government, and should now, no doubt, be in the possession of the right of suffrage. We cannot deny that there are many male voters too ignorant or unprincipled to properly exercise this right; but they hav been put in possession of it, and it can never be taken from them, until aristocrats and plutocrats hav crushed out liberty and independence in the industrial classes; and this they will probably never fully accomplish.

No intelligent Liberal, male or female, needs evidence to show the status of the church through past centuries toward Liberals and Liberalism. In weakness it said: "If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not." In power it said: "And those my enemies who would not that I should rule over them, bring hither and slay them before me!" Untaxed church property, chaplains in legislatures, state and national, and in the army and navy, proclamations for fasts and thanksgivings, Bibles in schools, religious tyranny in courts, "Sabbath" laws, prosecutions of Liberal publishers, almost universal denunciation and ostracism of Liberals, male and female, together with their desperate efforts to more effectually unite church and state, and put "God" and their religion into our constitutions, both state and national—if all these things are not sufficient to satisfy people of the folly, danger, and madness of putting more power into the hands of the clergy, then their condition is hopeless.

Every intelligent person, whether Liberal or bigot, very well knows that, at present, women are the chief attendants on, and supporters of, the church; and the great majority of them are under the thumb of the clergy. If it were not for the women—the great majority of which are "soldiers of the cross," and must attend the "dress parade" on the orders of the brigadiers—the churches would be empty in less than six months. Giv them the right of suffrage now, and the church would soon fill every legislature with her willing tools, and the triumph of "God in the Constitution" would be a reality heralded by the "hallelujahs" of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Young Women's Christian Association. And where, then, would be the inalienable rights of heretics and Liberals, either male or female? I feel fully confident this would be the result of such a step at the present time; and such a result would bring on the bloodiest revolution America ever saw. Who would put the ballot in the hands of the "lady" plutocrat of New York who said "Shoot down the strikers!" or the one who attended the opera there with a "crown" on her head? Shades of Paine, Franklin, and Jefferson! I would sooner giv the ballot to a royal Bengal tiger or a hyena.

Wanted, a Fact.

Ah, parsons are solemn, and grave, and wise,
But still, when I sit in some cushioned pew,
My lashes will droop o'er my half-shut eyes,
And I can't help wishing the service through;
For they dish up miracles not a few—
With dogmas galore is the discourse packed—
But I long for talk that's a trifle new,
And I'd giv all creeds for a solid fact.

They ask me to swallow such ancient lies,
With fictions and stories each phrase imbue,
And dwell on the gourd of stupendous size
That up over Jonah so quickly grew;
And by pictures the old-time prophets drew
My spirit is tortured, my brain is racked,
And I'm tired of their texts and tenets too;
And I'd giv all creeds for a single fact.

And so, when I listen, I can but rue
That rarely the preachers will seek to rise
Up into the hights of the brave and true,
Away from the darkness their faith implies;
But seldom they offer to serve in lieu
One taste of the stuff I hav always lacked;
And while they hold faith I'm exceeding blue,
And I'd giv all creeds for a single fact.

ENVOI.

And silent they are when I humbly sue
For legends with proof and the vouchers backed;
But still they must know it's my simple due,
And I'd giv all creeds for a single fact.

Animals Not in the Ark.

From the Washington Star.

Reptils, as they are found in the world at the present day, are but degenerate survivors of their kind as they existed in epochs long ago, said Professor Cope. The first reptils of the world made their appearance at the close of the paleozoic period, when the coal was in process of formation. They were all land animals. Among them there were no flying creatures, no marine swimmers, no gigantic types, and no especially herbivorous kinds.

At the close of the coal-forming period there occurred a great emergence of land from the water, and reptilian life rapidly spread and grew. The reptils which had previously existed were all of one kind. Their remains are found in this country wherever the deposits in lagoons, lakes, and estuaries hav been calculated for their preservation. From this point of time, however, began what may be appropriately called the epoch of reptils. The paleozoic period was brought to a close by a great upheaval, due to contraction of the earth's crust, by which the Alleghanies and the Ural systems were uplifted. Then began what is called the "mesozoic epoch," during which the reptils may be said to hav run creation. That is to say, they were the highest order of beings at that time alive. What man is now the reptil was then—that is, lord of all existing things. Reptils walked upon land, navigated the water, flew through the air, and, in short, pursued every avenue of existence that is zoologically conceivable.

CAMARASAURUS, SEVENTY FEET LONG.

Early in the mesozoic epoch there appeared marine reptils which, though derived from land species, became more and more aquatic through the necessity of living in water, developed on that account swimming organs, etc. Land reptils also began to develop in huge proportions. Why they grew so big no one knows, but it may hav been because they had no rivals in the struggle for existence; they had all they wanted to eat and naturally increased in bulk. At all events, no creatures are known to hav ever existed in this world comparable in size to these reptils of ages ago.

AGATHAUMOS, FORTY FEET LONG.

What the mammals are in the scale of creation today the reptils were in the mesozoic epoch. They swam the seas, climbed trees, and were most phenomenal jumpers. Some of them even flew. While some were herbivorous, living upon plants, others were carnivorous, preserving existence by devouring their vegetable-eating cousins. The vegetarian reptils were enormous beasts, often as much as seventy feet in length. They afforded food for the carnivorous reptils, which were smaller than the herbivorous kind, just as lions and tigers nowadays are smaller than oxen. Though bigger, the vegetarian creatures usually had no armor nor weapons to defend themselvs with. Their most powerful defense was a kick, which, delivered with a hind leg fifteen feet in length, was assuredly not by any means to be despised. The herbivorous reptils of that epoch were mainly of three descriptions:

First was the biggest of all animals known to the world from the beginning thereof to the present day. Its name was the "camarasaurus." It went on all fours, and the vertebræ composing its backbone were hollow—mere shells in fact—filled with warm air from the lungs, just as is the case with the bones of some birds to day. Undoubtedly it lived in the sea, walking along in water deep enough to cover its back. It fed upon the vegetation along shore, and its neck was long and crane-like.

Other herbivorous reptils of the same period had enormously long hind legs, on which they were able to wade far out into deep water after seaweeds and other food. These creatures were particularly extraordinary in point of their dental equipment, inasmuch as each of them had about two thousand grinders to chew with, arranged in magazines of five hundred each, like cartridges.

CARNIVOROUS LAELAPS FORTY FEET LONG.

Another species of herbivorous reptils lived upon land, but they were so powerfully armed that they were able to oppose a formidable defense against attack. Some of them had huge horns on their heads like bulls, while others bore similar weapons above their noses, like the rhinoceri of to day. So well able were they to defend themselvs that they lived and multiplied in the same regions with the most ferocious of the carnivorous monsters.

Thus you will understand that there were three kinds of herbivorous giants in the mesozoic epoch. There was the camarasaurus, which fed neck-deep along the seashore, its hollow backbone serving as a float and its solid legs and tail for anchors; next was the kangaroo-like hadrosaurus, which waded out upon its long hind legs into deep water in search of food, and finally there was the dangerous agathaumos, with enormous horns.

The carnivorous reptils of that wonderful age were more uniform in their structure. They were mostly built in the kangaroo style and of lighter frame. Early in their history there were some of them with hollow bones which were probably the greatest jumpers ever known among vertebrates. Certain varieties of these developed flying powers, with a spread of wing, if such it may be termed, of twenty feet from tip to tip. Some of these latter had teeth, while others were provided merely with beaks like those of birds, diving in the water for the fish on which they lived. Thus, you observe, there were land saurians, water saurians, and air saurians.

The so-called mesozoic epoch was brought to a close by the cataclysm, due to contraction and consequent crumbling of the earth's crust, which upheaved the Rocky mountains and the Andes on this hemisphere, and the Alps, Pyrenees, Balkans, and Himalayas on the other side of the world. Incidentally to this tremendous alteration in the face of the earth all these giant reptils were wiped out of existence. This event opened what is called to-day the tertiary epoch. It is in the tertiary epoch that we liv now. At the beginning of this epoch the only reptils which survived were the snakes, lizards, turtles, and crocodiles, all of them resembling closely those of their kind which exist to-day.

Of the turtles it may be said that they represent the most ancient type of all vertebrates, resembling closely as they do the reptils of their kind which existed so far back as the mesozoic era. There were sea tortoises during that epoch which measured twenty feet in spread of flippers, while some tertiary tortoises were not less big in body, measuring twelve feet from head to tail.

Reptils hav not changed much since the opening of the tertiary epoch. Perhaps the most marked feature of their development is found in the poison glands of snakes, which are simply salivary glands modified. However, such reptils as we find to-day on the earth, where once they reigned as the most highly developed beings, are but degenerate types of those which lived long ago.

We need more subscribers to the paper. We giv more than any other Freethought journal for the money, and consequently it costs more to publish the paper. The pictures alone cost some fifteen hundred dollars annually; yet they are a feature that all would dislike to hav discontinued. They are forcible weapons against superstition, and do their work well. But our friends should not forget that they cost a good deal.

THE constant discussion in the press of this country and Canada of the benefits and dangers of reciprocity in trade with, or annexation to the United States of, our northern neighbor, as well as the making of the question an issue in the last Canadian elections, has led to the preparation for THE TRUTH SEEKER of an exhaustiv article upon Canada so far as its annexation would affect the progress of this country toward complete liberty in religious matters and the total separation of church and state, now unhappily a matter of theory and not of fact. The title — "Canada — the Coming Issue" — suggests its scope. It carefully considers Canada's history and government; the Protestant and Catholic provinces, so widely divergent in all interests but those of orthodoxy; their un-American doctrins; the outlook for annexation, and "The Next War From the North." Catholicism is shown in all its hideousness, and its dangers to our country

The article will appear in the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Two Admirable Pamphlets.

J. D. Shaw in Independent Pulpit.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1891 is a very handsome pamphlet of 114 pages, containing, besides a complete calendar, several very interesting articles on important subjects. Among these is one entitled "Side Lights on South Sea Missions," by Ada Campbell. This one article is worth the price of the pamphlet, which is only 25 cents.

Liberty in Literature.

From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Here we hav in neat book form an address delivered before a large audience in Philadelphia, Oct. 21, 1890. It is accompanied with an excellent portrait of Whitman, and on the title-page we read the motto, "Let us put wreaths on the brows of the living." This worthy task was well done by the colonel, and it is worth remarking that the profits of the lecture were given to its subject, the venerable poet, to add to his comforts in his helpless declining years; but besides this double benefit to Whitman, Colonel Ingersoll has laid us all under obligation to him for this grand tribute to liberty in literature. He says Whitman is in the highest sense a believer in Democracy, that there is but one excuse for government—the preservation of liberty, to the end that man may be happy, and this declaration of independence the colonel indorses, justifies, and fortifies by a grand presentation of the useful and beautiful in Walt Whitman's poems. Further he praises Whitman because he announced the gospel of the body, denied the depravity of natural man, taught the dignity and glory of the father and the mother. Every lover of poetry and of liberty should possess this rare book of grand ideas. Price, 25 cents in paper; 50 cents in cloth.

The Postmaster-General's Delinquencies.

The following is from the Independent of last week:

"Some of the Western Catholic papers are still keeping up their attack upon Postmaster-General Wanamaker because 'a registered letter, written by Cardinal Simeoni, and sent from Rome to a Catholic Polish gentleman in Detroit, was delivered to another person in that city, who had a peculiar interest in learning its contents,' and who substituted a different inclosure before it reached the person to whom it was addressed. We said that there was no question that if the guilt were proved the offender would be punished. But one would hardly imagin from reading the report that the letter-carrier delivered the letter at the house of the man to whom it was addressed and took a receipt therefor from the man's wife. It was after it had been delivered to the man's wife that it passed over into the hands of the person who made the substitution before it came back to her husband. The carrier was dismissed for delivering it to the woman instead of to her husband. This very much relieves the weight of the charge."

Just how far Mr. Wanamaker is responsible for this particular delinquency of course we cannot say.

There is, however, another delinquency relating to business of the postal department about which we are better informed, and to which we desire to again call the attention of the postmaster-general. In our possession there is a document as follows:

"UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY.
"Received from THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY,
"Feb. 11, 1891, One Pc'k marked to the Postmaster-General,
"Washington, D. C.
"10c. p'd. (Signed) STEVENS."

It was just two months ago that this particular document came into our possession. The United States Express Company has lately carried for us several hundred packages, and every one has been promptly delivered to the person for whom it was designed. The company claims to hav also delivered this, but so far no acknowledgment of it has been received from Washington.

The package contained a well-bound book, purchased from a large publishing house of this city, and also a letter to the postmaster-general. The name of the book and the purport of the letter may be learned from the following extracts from the letter:

TO JOHN WANAMAKER, POSTMASTER-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES:

Dear Sir: In your report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, which you hav kindly forwarded to me, I find in explanation of your act excluding from the mails "a translation of a questionable book," these paragraphs:

"An act of Congress passed March 3, 1873 (R. S., section 3893), provided, 'That no obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, . . . shall be carried in the mail;' and further, that any person who should knowingly mail or cause to be mailed, or who should knowingly receive or cause to be received from the mails articles before declared to be non-mailable should be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or to imprisonment at hard labor for not less than one year or more than ten years. It was soon found that it was not enough merely to provide for the exclusion of 'obscene, lewd, and lascivious' publications, but that publications that were simply 'indecent' had also better be excluded; and accordingly Congress, by the act of July 12, 1876 (19 Stat., p. 90), extended the prohibitions by adding thereto the words, 'or other publications of an indecent character,' and by forbidding not only the carriage of such matter in the mails, but 'the delivery of it from any post-office or by any letter-carrier;' so that the statute was amended to read as follows:

"'Every obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character . . . is hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office, nor by any letter-carrier.'

"The statute was thus broadened by prohibiting the transmission of any matter offensiv to modesty, or tending to subvert respect for decency and morality, first by constituting the postmaster-general the judge of the character of such matter to forbid its carriage in the mails (which could only be prevented by executiv order), and second by leaving to judicial action the duty of imposing penalties.

"It does not matter whether or not a given publication presented for mailing appears, by complaint or otherwise, to a postmaster to be 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious,' if it does appear to be 'indecent.' He is obliged, in order not to become a law-breaker, to refer the questionable point to the proper department official. It does not matter, when the referee considers the question, whether the given publication is merely 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious.' If it is simply indecent, he must exclude it or break the law. A translation of a questionable book was, as a matter of fact, presented some months since at the post-office in a Western city for transmission in the mails. It was held and referred to this department. The assistnat attorney-general, finding it indecent under any definition of the word, issued an order excluding it. To exclude the book was the simple duty of the department. For myself I never discuss the policy or wisdom of breaking the law, and the officials of the post-office department do not.

"Some hav said that the exclusion of a book only draws attention to it and makes the damage caused by its sale the greater. That, as I conceive, is no affair of a sworn public official. Moreover, the 'advertising' which it is held the department gave the objectionable publication was entirely due to the thrifty bluster of the publisher who, however much he complained of the injustice of the decision of the department, never appealed to the postmaster-general to hav it reversed. The question is not pertinent, either, why the department does not exclude certain other publications from the mails which are admitted to be indecent. It treats these cases only as they are brought to its attention; and one complaint is considered as carefully as another. To try to pursue any other policy—to try to find publications which on one pretext or another might be excluded—would be to try to establish a real censorship of the mails, which is entirely foreign to what I conceive to be the duty of the postmaster-general."

In a marginal title to the subject you are discussing, you say also that the "postmaster-general is obliged to act when applied to," and in the case of the book alluded to that to exclude "any matter offensiv to modesty, or tending to subvert respect for decency and morality," is "the simple duty of the department."

I now respectfully apply to you for a decision on a book published in this city and other places, and which can be found in nearly every bookstore in the country, and is sent through the mails daily. The title of the book is as follows:

THE
HOLY BIBLE,
CONTAINING THE
OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS:
TRANSLATED OUT OF
THE ORIGINAL TONGUES;
AND WITH
THE FORMER TRANSLATIONS DILIGENTLY COMPARED AND REVISED.
NEW YORK:
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,
INSTITUTED IN THE YEAR MDCCCXVI,
1890.

The volume appears to be made up of little books bound together. To facilitate your examination of the work, I would respectfully refer you to chapters iv, xvi, xvii, xviii, xix, xx, xxi, xxix, xxxiv, xxxviii, xxxix, and others of the book called Genesis; chapters iv, xiii, xxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, and others of the book called Exodus; chapters xv, xviii, xx, xxi, and others of the book called Leviticus; chapters v, xxxi, and others of the book called Numbers; chapters xxi, xxii, xxiii, and others of the book called Deuteronomy; chapters ii, vi, and others of the book called Joshua; chapters xvi, xix, xx, xxi, of the book called Judges; chapter iii and others of the book called Ruth; chapters i, ii, xix, and others of the book called 1 Samuel; chapters iii, vi, xvi, and others of the book called 2 Samuel; chapters i, xi, xvi, and others of the book called 1 Kings; chapter ix of the book called 2 Kings; chapters xxxi, xl, and others of the book called Job; chapters v, xxiii, and others of the collection called Proverbs; chapters i, ii, v, vii, viii, and others of the book called Solomon's Song; chapters lvii and others of the book called Isaiah; chapters i, ii, iii, xlix, and others of the book called Jeremiah; chapters iv, xvi, xxiii, and others of the book called Ezekiel; chapters i, ii, iii, iv, and others of the book called Hosea; chapter i of the book called Micah; chapter i of the book called St. Matthew; chapter vii of the book called St. Mark; chapters i and ii of the book called St. Luke; chapter viii of the book called St. John; chapters i and iv of the book called an epistle to the Romans; chapters v, vi, vii, and others of the book called an epistle to the Corinthians; chapter xvii of the book called Revelation, and such other passages as Mr. Tyner may find, if indeed he find these, to be obnoxious to the statutes cited by you in justification of the exclusion from the mails of the book alluded to.

I am not ignorant of the fact that there is a great difference of opinion as to what constitutes a book which would come under the law of March 3, 1873 (R. S. § 3893), but since Congress has added the clause italicized by you in the act of July 12, 1876 (19 Stat., page 90), and you hav given your definition of such works as "any matter offensiv to modesty, or tending to subvert respect for decency and morality," the classification of literature has become easier; and I submit to you whether the book under consideration does not come within your definition of publications which are of an indecent character. If it should be so, the public has your word for it that the "postmaster-general is obliged to act when applied to," and that the exclusion of such works is but "the simple duty of the department." The facts that the book has had a large sale, is read by the best of people, and is to be found in the home of nearly every citizen of the United States, will of course hav no influence with you, for we know that you "never discuss the policy or wisdom of breaking the law, and that the officials of the post-office department do not." And also, that calling attention to the work in this public way, by which its circulation may be greatly increased, will not deter you from doing your duty we also know from your own words, as such is no affair of a sworn public official. Whatever advertising your department may giv the book will be due of course to the thrifty bluster of the publishers, and not to you or me who are but doing our duty as citizens—I in calling your attention to the work (as your department "can treat cases only as brought to your attention"), and you as a sworn public official who never discusses the policy or wisdom of breaking the law.

Yours very respectfully,
EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It seems to us, in view of the words of the postmaster-general in his report, that the neglect to reply to this letter is as culpable a delinquency as the one cited by the Catholics in their reflections upon Mr. Wanamaker; and that if some employee of the post-office department has thrown the package to one side, he should be as promptly discharged as the carrier who delivered to a man's wife a letter intended only for the husband.

We hav repeatedly written to the postmaster-general in relation to this matter; hav also sent copies of the letters to Judge Tyner, the subordinate who sits in judgment upon books submitted for official decision as to the modesty or indecency of their contents, and Mr. Benjamin Harrison's attention has likewise been called to the case. But if some clerks in Mr. Wanamaker's department and in the White House hav concealed our letters, we respectfully submit that such clerks should be discharged and more conscientious people employed in their places.

We desire a decision; but if we cannot obtain that, we desire to know why? Other publishers had not been treated thus cavalierly, and why should the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER be made an exception in the exercise of official courtesy and duty?

Our Rulers' Recreations.

There are certain members of the senate and assembly of this state who can always be depended upon by the church, especially the Roman Catholic church, to vote for exemptions of church property, for priests and ministers in our public institutions, and for money to be paid directly to church institutions.

The other night there was a prize-fight between a nigger and a paddy at Troy, N. Y., a few miles from Albany, and about every one of these fellows was there. There were Assemblymen Byrne, Mullaney, and Sullivan of this city; and "Senator Mike Collins of Troy held a seat so near the ring that he could see the punchmarks on the men." Not only were the city representativs there, but, say the reports in the daily papers, "many an assemblyman from Wayback, who had paid his $10 quietly and like a man with a guilty conscience, has seen enough to open his eyes wider than they were ever before. There were plenty of them at the ring side last night. Assemblymen and prize-fighters sat shoulder to shoulder." Besides these there was a judge from this city whose business it is to punish lawbreakers of the class which includes pugilists, and who is noted for his partiality to Catholic institutions in committing vagrant children. The ornamental among our officials were also mixed up with the useless. "Among the early birds was Assistant Adjt.-General McEwan. His long title did not seem to make him a bit gloomy. On the contrary, he was the happiest man there. At the opening of the fight he pulled out a quart bottle of champagne and, uncorking it, drank to the success of Dixon. After that, every time Dixon landed on McCarthy the jovial ring-sider would take a drink from the bottle." Neither were great politicians not in office wanting at the festivities. "In the first row and near McEwan sat Gen. Erastus Corning. His big mustache had a sporting curl to it. He was a Dixon man from the ground up as high as he could wave his cane. His cane came in very handy on several occasions, for when McEwan would drink success to Dixon's blows the general would wave his cane and shout. Behind these two enthusiastic patrons of fistiana sat sandwiched in together men from every walk and class of life."

These fellows all enjoyed themselvs, even the assemblymen from Wayback. "Those who were in the same class with Dry Dollar Sullivan [assemblyman] came out so they could be seen, and yelled like hoodlums at the upper cuts and swings; but those who were new to the company of men with broken noses and mutilated ears kept in the background and rather shrunk from observation."

The Christian church has a fine lot of men to support her in her peculations from the people, and these self-same people ought to feel very proud of their representativs, particularly those from Wayback. New York city is run by the Romanists, and naturally her representativs would be found among the criminal classes.

But it must hav been an anomalous sight at the ring side to see a lot of Irishmen cheering at the fistic victory of an African over one of their own race. There are some young men in New York who can remember when they chased the nigger through the streets and hanged him to a lamp-post when caught.

Bloodthirsty Christians.

The events in this country of the past few weeks in connection with our Italian fellow human beings has shown how signally Christianity fails to civilize.

In the first place, the Mafia Society of New Orleans is composed of good Roman Catholic Christians, the sort that in Sicily band together for systematic robbery, and keep a private priest to absolve them and to care for the share of the plunder which goes to the church.

Secondly, the jury which acquitted the arrested members of the society were good Christian citizens.

Thirdly, the mob which murdered them was led by men made up of other good Christian citizens.

Fourthly, the government which refuses to punish the mob are all orthodox Christians.

The Italian government is the only party to this murderous business which shows up respectably, asking for the enforcement of law and order, and unless things hav greatly changed since Crispi's administration, that government is composed of heretics.

Fifthly, when the Italian government withdrew its minister to emphasize its demand for order, the Christian people of this great country at once begun to talk fight, count ironclads and cannon-balls on hand, and otherwise conduct themselvs like a small boy making faces at a neighbor's boy over the back-yard fence. They wanted to fight, and hoped they could. They wanted to kill somebody, because he happened to be born on the other side of the Atlantic ocean with a brunet complexion. They wanted to see blood flow a million times faster than it did in the parish prison yard at New Orleans.

Jesus Christ said he came not to bring peace but a sword. His disciples hav changed the sword into hundred-ton guns, explosiv shells, dynamite bombs, rapid-fire guns, and torpedoes, but the same old spirit of war clings to them. And the more conservativly orthodox they are, the fiercer is their desire to fight and destroy other Christians. They are greatly disappointed that the Italian government will afford them no opportunity.

Make It a Political Issue.

Mr. C. Beal, president of the Oregon State Secular Union, has addressed the following letter to the Liberals of his state:

"I desire to address myself to the Liberals and other reformers of the state of Oregon. One churchman holds the legal title to about five million dollars' worth of lands in this state. This passes to his successor in office, thus fastening on our commonwealth a heartless perpetuity. Every forty years the property of this nation passes through the hands of the tax-collector. Five million dollars' worth of unburdened real estate, with its accretions, will be able in time to swallow up every other acre in the state. A large majority of the people favor the taxation of church property. A majority of the present legislature personally desire it. But with a cartload of petitions and all our influence it cannot be obtained.

"We must beat somebody and elect somebody with the ten thousand votes we hold. This does not mean a new party. The experiment has been tried before. We took Governor Hoadley of Ohio out of a party that was in the minority and elected him by a large majority when superstition undertook to crush him out. The same persons who led that campaign hav proposed to come and lead us here. Let us accept their services. Let us make up the next legislature so that we will hav dominion over it sufficiently to procure a few righteous laws for the benefit of the people. Let us beat a gold-bug for United States Senator and elect a silver man. Let us defeat a Blair fanatic and elect a man who favors Secular government and undisturbed religion, who will work and vote for civil and religious liberty for the people.

"To this end I invite you to attend the Oregon state Secular convention to meet in Portland the middle of October and inaugurate the campaign. In the mean time I will appoint a committee of fifteen to prepare and submit an address to the convention, and when passed upon to be circulated among the people as the first 'Crisis Paper' in the coming struggle for the rights and liberties of the people. These are the times that try men's souls."

This is a good and practical beginning, and if the Liberals of Oregon can control ten thousand votes they can, by standing aloof from both political parties and voting only for men pledged to carry out their objects, tax the churches and make Oregon's government strictly secular. The total vote of the state is about seventy-two thousand, and the usual Republican majority is about eight thousand. Ten thousand votes would control the situation, as the majority of Liberals in the West hav heretofore acted with the Republican party.

Editorial Notes.

WANTED to know: If the Prohibitionists were correctly represented by one of the editorial writers of the Voice when he told his German tonsorial friend that the Prohibitionists did not want to stop the drinking of liquor, only its sale over saloon bars? How will they get liquor to drink if no one can sell it? Will each be his own distiller? or shall the government make it? or shall it be distilled as at present and hid away in dives, hollow trees, barber shops, drug stores, and other hypocritical places?

THE Ohio and Massachusetts legislatures are endeavoring to suppress the materialistic side of Spiritualism, and for that purpose the proposed California bill has been introduced in both bodies, as follows: "That any so-called clairvoyant, medium, or other fortune-teller, who shall practice his or her profession in this state, and receive money or other consideration therefor, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall for each offense be fined not more than $20 nor less than $5, or be imprisoned not more than ten days, or both, as the court may direct." In Illinois a bill is before the legislature making it a misdemeanor to impersonate the spirit of any deceased person at any Spiritualist séance or exhibition. These are stupid persecuting measures, and are evidently inspired by the clergy, who dislike religious rivals.

THE Wesleyans of London are excited over a paper read by Professor Davison at a meeting of the London Wesleyan ministers, in which he admitted the composit character of the Pentateuch and the double authorship of Isaiah, and held that the traditional view of inspiration was no longer tenable. He also held that Christians must not take up the position that their faith in Christ depended upon their faith in the scriptures, but that their faith in the scriptures depended upon their faith in Christ. In the course of the debate following the paper Dr. Rigg said that he had never accepted the doctrin of verbal inspiration, and the Rev. J. S. Simon was relieved to find that Methodist standards did not affirm definit views of inspiration. These declarations hav caused dismay in orthodox circles, as they well may. If this sort of thing keeps up there will soon be no simon-pure Christians left but the Roman and Greek Catholics.

ONE of the most dishonest methods of the church is her method of writing for children. In an Easter supplement for the young of a religious journal are some brief stories of "Reformers and Philanthropists." Among the men thus glorified are Abraham Lincoln and Horace Greeley. Of the first it is related: "No man could be found more familiar with the Bible than he. This is apparent both in his conversation and his writing. There is hardly a speech or state paper of his in which allusions and illustrations taken from the Bible do not appear." This bare statement is in itself strictly true. Lincoln was very familiar with the book, as are most Infidels. But the impression left upon the mind of the child reading it is that Lincoln was a believer in the book; that he regarded it as greater and worthier than all other books; that he was a Christian. This impression is false—a downright lie—and the church people are flagrantly dishonest in permitting such writing. Of Horace Greeley the same dishonest impression is left. The story states: "The first book which he read consecutivly through was the Bible, under the guidance of his mother, when he was about five years old." Very likely a pious mother did guide him through the Bible—and a child of five years needs skilful guidance through that book—but Horace Greeley was not in mature life a Christian. He was the first president of the Manhattan Liberal Club, then as now an organization of heretics, and he never subscribed to any Christian creed.

IT will be remembered that when E. B. Foote, Jr., one of the vice-presidents of the American Secular Union, was before the legislativ committee at Albany to oppose the "Freedom of Worship" bill, he found Eldridge T. Gerry, a professional Protestant philanthropist, favoring the measure, which caused Dr. Foote much surprise, as heretofore the same gentleman had been opposed to the proposed law, which should allow the Roman Catholics to set up an altar in the Randall's Island House of Refuge. We pointed out the probable reason of this change of heart on the part of Mr. Gerry, and since then it has developed that we were about right. A new bill has been introduced, forbidding the commitment of children under twelve years to the House of Refuge. This would compel the police magistrates of this city to hand all children under that age over to the sectarian institutions, chief of which are the Protestant New York Juvenile Asylum and the Roman Catholic Protectory. A fair division of these human spoils is what Mr. Gerry, of the Juvenile Asylum, desires; and to get it he is willing to let the Catholics into the House of Refuge. It is the evident intention of both sects to supersede the state institution by their own sectarian houses, and thus compel the state to pay for making good Christians of the "flotsam and jetsam on the wild rude sea of life." We said last week, before the introduction of this new bill had been made public, that Mr. Gerry was log-rolling, and those subsequent proceedings prove that we were right.

Letters from Friends.

PETERBORO, N. H., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would as soon think of living without food as to be without your paper and also the Ironclad Age. What we Freethinkers want is peace and harmony amongst ourselvs and not so much twitting and flinging, for it does not look well nor sound well. I giv away all of my papers after I read them, and I do not want people to think, which they will, that we are fighting amongst ourselvs. Please giv my best regards to all of our Freethinking women and tell them all through your paper to keep right on writing and talking. H. B. RALEIGH.

COQUILLE CITY, ORE., March 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I write to THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning the death of my brother, T. V. Nichols, a stanch Liberal who fought the good fight and has crossed over the river. He has been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for fifteen years, taking it almost from the start; an ardent admirer of D. M. Bennett for the past eight years. He was a Spiritualist, having become such by investigation; an Infidel of the Thomas Paine school. Although a Spiritualist, THE TRUTH SEEKER was a favorit paper of his. In politics he was with the workingmen. A minister called on him a few hours asking him to embrace Christianity. My brother asked him if he had anything better than humanity; if so, in what did it consist. The D.D. left to pray for him. He died as he had lived, leaving many friends who will some day meet him. For the last five years he has lived in Bandon, Coos county, Ore. He served during the war in the 46th Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. The people of Bandon lose a good man. HENRY H. NICHOLS.

FORT WAYNE, IND., March 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Within please find $3 25 to apply on my subscription and for the ANNUAL for 1891. We are having a Freethought revival here at the present. J. E. Remsburg gave us a lecture on the 9th of last month. His subject was, "False Claims." The small audience was well pleased, and I think by the time he or some other Liberal lecturer comes here we will be in shape to giv them a larger audience.

We hav started a Secular Union here, with some thirty-three names; got our charter, elected officers, and rented a hall. Now all we need is the hearty assistance of the Liberals here and elsewhere to make our Union a grand success. We hav plenty of material here to work on. Ignorance and superstition hav been sown broadcast in our city by the Christian churches for years, and therefore we hav rather a hard job before us. But with proper management and hard work I feel confident of success. Our Union will be the Fort Wayne Secular Union, with J. S. Frost, president; J. C. Garman, secretary, and M. W. Mench, treasurer. Hoping as soon as we get something in our treasury to send you an order for some pamphlets, I remain, Yours for the good of humanity, J. S. FROST.

ITHACA, N. Y., March 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having just subscribed for your valuable paper, I thought I would giv you a few of my imaginations. For the whole human family liv on imagination, for no human being ever saw, smelled, tasted, heard, or felt a Lord. And if there is one I love him better than any Christian in the world, for my Lord never created an Adam to be the father of all the human family, black, white, and all colors, and devils, and Eves, and pronounced them all very good. My Lord knows what he is about, for when he makes anything he is never sorry, for my Lord never had to hav a son born, the best boy in the world, and see him nailed to a cross with his hands and feet pierced with nails while he could at one swoop of his hand hav wiped the whole world out of existence. Oh, what a cruel God the Christian God is, to make that good son suffer for his own misdeeds, and place that good man Adam in his garden and let his Satan come down and tempt poor Miss Eve, for she did not know the serpent was a-lying. And he had to turn the poor things out. That was a farce for the devil, and Adam and Mrs. Adam beat the Lord out of his good intentions. Now the churches hav to fight the devil night and day. They hav their priests to tell them how to keep him back and scare him off. They all differ as to the mode of procedure. They all claim, "We are right and the other church is wrong."

WM. L. MARSH.

DALLAS, TEX., March 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been intensely interested and amused in the late controversy of field secretary, and now the badge. The pansy, the first, can well be disposed of as "the winter of our discontent." Of the latter some very truthful things hav been said. Each participant has, in a measure, narrowed and lessened Freethought to individual benefits—in fact, limiting that which should remain unlimited. The question I shall spring is as to the necessity of a badge. Is it essential? Must it become a necessity? I am inclined to think all symbols are a hindrance to progress. The honest man does not hav a label attached to his person asserting his integrity, nor need he shout aloud, I am an honest man! Opportunities are abundant in which he may truthfully assume his position more effectivly. Labels and badges are like paste diamonds, but are not proof positiv that the possessor has the real article at hand. Freedom and liberty are only one brand, and the real article may present itself unsupported by labels or badges. Labels add nothing to the bona-fide article, but always giv a false value in the spurious. Although the beautiful pansy contains all the elements of unobtrusivness, all ideal tints of truth and gentleness, peace and joy—indeed, how sweetly and kindly do the beautifully tinted blossoms hide and overcome the green leaves of jealousy till nought is left of their evil earthliness—yet if we pluck this beautiful flower how soon it withers. Is it not possible to love and revere and not destroy? If by art we imitate the blossom, it then is only paste; can we be satisfied with paste? Hardly! Then being at liberty to model from this beautiful and lovely blossom, let us commit no sacrilege. J. V. MULKS.

PAYSON, ARIZ., March 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When I gaze on Mr. Heston's cartoon, "Freethought Turnpike Free to All," hope within runs nigh Sierras high. But when I turn a few pages of the grand TRUTH SEEKER and there read the quarrels of the American Secular Union, I see things in a different light, or no light at all. Their quarrels are like the lines:

What they killed each other for
I never could well make out.

What they are fussing over one can hardly tell, save it is because they all want an office. You know and I know our numbers are small, while the forces of the enemy, superstition, are well united and number millions. Why not make up the great family quarrel, right about and face the foe? I suppose the Union believes in evolution. I do, and that by their late actions they are drifting back into the monkey (except the ladies of the Union). If uneducated people would do as our Union they would be termed heathens. I do not know who is in fault. One can seldom tell, when a family fuss is going on. I hav been helping on the cause all I hav been able—buying books, taking THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Independent Pulpit, also doing all the missionary work I am able to do. I did want to join the Union after a while. But if this great family fuss does not close or cease I can see but little hope for Freethought. I'll sing you a song and quit:

Wherever the Lord erects a house of prayer
You will always find a jackass there,
And 'twill be found upon examination
He's a pedler of hell and damnation.

Yours in the kingdom we hav, ARIZONA SAND.

NORSE, TEX., Feb. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Portland, Ore., delivered a lecture here at Norse on Saturday night, March 14th, to a good and appreciativ audience, on "The Old and the New; or, Evolution vs. Creation." She handled her subject in a masterly manner, and held her audience in enraptured attention for one hour, the only regret being that her lecture was not continued for another hour. She intended to hav lectured on Sunday, March 15th, but the incessant rain compelled its postponement till the next dav.

On Monday night, March 16th, Mrs. Krekel delivered a lecture on "Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint," in which her penetrating and keen acumen was used to great advantage, and her great oratorical power was displayed with great effect. The audience was held in enraptured attention for over an hour, and interrupted her with frequent and spontaneous applause.

I think that Mrs. Krekel, in these lectures, successfully removed the foundations of the Christianity of to-day to the entire satisfaction of those of her audience whose prejudices did not prevent them from seeing clearly. Her lectures must be heard to be appreciated, and I shall not even attempt to giv a synopsis.

Some—not to say many—people think that a woman must necessarily be sentimental when speaking in public. This, however, cannot be truthfully said of Mrs. Krekel. Her discourses abound in indisputable facts, arrayed in such coherent order as to not only logically prove her positions, but she marshals the facts to sustain her arguments in such a way as to make her positions impregnable. She is a good reasoner, and a master of logic. She presents facts, verified knowledge—science—truth. She is scholarly and profound, and does not want in rhetoric.

Mrs. Krekel is, in short, an earnest, logical, coherent, and at the same time, comprehensiv and eloquent speaker.

May success attend her efforts, wherever she may go, in her noble endeavors for the advancement of a truer and higher civilization. T. THEO. COLWICK.

DALTON, GA., March 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Remsburg gave us a free lecture on the 23d of this month on "False Claims." It was the first Liberal lecture ever delivered in this place, and we think our little city was highly honored, as it was the only one in Georgia in which he lectured.

We procured the Opera House for him to speak in.

The audience was composed of about one hundred and fifty persons, and in honesty and intelligence it was somewhat above the average of church attendance, though there were few or none of the codfish aristocracy present, and the professional gentlemen were conspicuous by their absence. I presume they were afraid of the church. Several ladies graced the occasion with their presence. All honor to them for having sense and courage enough to come out and hear a Freethought lecture. The crowd behaved remarkably well, and gave the speaker close and respectful attention, only four or five persons leaving the hall during the speaking.

Almost everyone I hav spoken to since the lecture admits Mr. Remsburg to be a talented and polished speaker if he is an Infidel.

We hope to hav him with us again in the near future. The church is all-powerful in this section, and of course tyrannical, but I think the Liberal element is making some progress.

A few years ago it would hav been impossible for an Infidel to hav procured a house here to speak in, or induced anyone to come out and listen to him. The owners and manager of our Opera House, although nominally Christians, are enlightened gentlemen, and we had no trouble in getting the hall at the customary price, which is not always the case, I am sorry to say, in the cities of the enlightened North. I am a Materialist of the Otto Wettstein, T. Winter stripe, and all my friends and neighbors know it. I see you hav up a controversy over the badge question. I prefer the Wettstein badge, and only wish I was able to possess one. Long liv Heston and the pictures.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, J. H. HAMILTON.

P. S.—I forgot to mention that the Christians' so-called "Providence" favored us with a beautiful moonlight night for our meeting. It was the most pleasant night since Christmas. J. H. H.

HANKINS, N. Y., March 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to express my opinion, though humble, on the pansy versus Freethought pin as an emblem for the Liberals of America. First take the pansy—true, it means thought, but does it mean Freethought? If not, why, it may be worn by people of every thought, whether it has been told to them by priest or preacher, whether it is a superstitious thought or non-superstitious thought. There is nothing more of it. Second, they say it is a cheaper emblem, as the torch is too expensiv. But could not the torch or Freethought badge of Mr. Wettstein be produced in a somewhat cheaper form also, for those that cannot afford such an expensiv one? For surely if they would wear a cheap pansy badge they would wear a cheap Freethought one as well. In the main I agree with Miss Susan H. Wixon, that the pansy is more for lovers than for that which is destined to be the largest shade of opinion on the globe. Do not let us follow the countries in this particular that hav always followed us in others, when we hav something equal and which I think is far superior—namely, the Otto Wettstein Freethought badge as an emblem for the Liberals of America. Why? First, because it is a very neat and fine badge, with the word Freethought engraved on a very clear blue background, which signifies that everything should be clear and bright before the mind before we can think for ourselvs or hav Freethought, that is, be free from that dark fog of superstition. Second comes the sunlight of science, which giv the mind more light, as the rising sun does the eye as it rises over the eastern hills and transforms the clear blue sky of early morn to a golden hue, for as we see with our eyes so sees our mind. Third comes the torch of reason, by which we are trying to guide our fellow-man out of the darkness beyond the moon and stars where superstition reigns supreme, which is the fourth and last place on my badge, and which as I look at it my eye can not see nor my mind cannot reach. Miss Wixon says, if there is to be any change she suggests to do away with superstition. If that is done, what do we want of the torch of reason? In my opinion, as it is so shall it remain, and be the emblem of the world for mental freedom.

Respectfully, W. S. GALLOWAY.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., March 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The ice is broken and the Liberal people of Chattanooga hav listened to lectures on Freethought and Liberalism delivered by J. E. Remsburg in Post No. 45 G. A. R. Hall in a most effectiv and satisfactory manner. It worked about like this: The first lecture was on Saturday night, and about two hundred and fifty people were present. Sunday morning about three hundred and fifty heard and appreciated the wise and powerful sayings of the speaker. And Sunday night the hall was packed to hear the Sunday question discussed, and Mr. Remsburg did ventilate that question most thoroughly, and the audience would show their appreciation by frequent and repeated applause. It is hardly necessary to say here that they were the best, most intelligent, industrious, and enterprising people of Chattanooga; educated people, who investigate, find out the truth and stick to it; people who become Freethinkers from personal investigation. This city is a great field for some one like Mr. Remsburg to come to and settle down. Mr. Remsburg is at home in Kansas, and I simply say, like him. Because the man who would come must be a good man; not offensiv, but of pleasing address and manners; not a challenger to preachers and priests. He must be a man whose sayings are unanswerable and invincible. We hav hundreds of people here who do not and cannot believe the Christian teachings. Those people hav investigated the matter enough to let it rest right there, because they hav no one to encourage them and they hav not got knowledge enough to defend themselvs against Christian intruders in an argument. And to become known as an unbeliever is no small matter for a business man to overcome. The word "Infidel" rings horribly in the ears of a Christian. But if we became organized, with a good man at the head of the society, the number would soon be up to a thousand. Popularity and social strength would follow. More light on Liberal subjects would bind us together in one grand social order of cheerful, intelligent, Liberal-minded people, who would command the respect of all good citizens. Last Sunday night it was announced that all Freethinkers should remain after the lecture, and temporary officers were chosen and forty-seven signed their names to organize a Liberal club. A committee was appointed to draft by-laws and resolutions for the members to adopt next Sunday. When once we are perfected then we shall become members of the American Secular Union, and through it we expect to get able lecturers, from time to time, to come here and storm superstition and hell out of Chattanooga. I can assure you it does not take much to do it, either, for this city has some great, Liberal-minded, talented, and brave people, and it does not take much to develop them. I will simply prove what I hav said by the fact that it took less than two hours to raise money enough to pay Mr. Remsburg and pay all other expenses connected with the lecture. You can see by that that the people here are financially liberal as well as mentally, and they hav also confidence in each other.

I would like to mention that when Mr. Remsburg mentioned the name of the great and good man, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the applause, and repeated and storming applause, was something that I could only compare with some great event that would sometimes happen during the dark days of war. In the future you will hear from Chattanooga often.

Very respectfully yours, CHRIS. BATHMAN.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., March 24, 291.

MR. EDITOR: The Kansas legislature passed a law to prevent the Kansas City Sunday Sun of Kansas from circulating within the state, but I learn from our representativ that the objectionable features hav been eradicated and so everything goes on smoothly for the present. But the law is there for future use, and was passed through the behest of the ministers of this state, or, more properly speaking, by the ministers of Salina. It was Senator J. G. Moler, of Salina, that introduced the bill, who is becoming quite notorious; it was he that introduced the "age of consent bill" placing twelve years as the time that a girl can consent to get married, which became a law a year ago, and which has not "been reduced yet."

As near as I can learn why the late law was passed for the repression of the above paper, is that it was given to divulging scandals in high places, and so you can easily understand why the ministers took such an activ part against it. That and the object of having future use for such a law is no doubt the motiv. Now I want to say, whatever the cause, it is a bad precedent, because it is a direct blow at free speech and free press. The law on libel is sufficient to protect these gentlemen unless they "are caught in the very act." Such a law is dangerous on any statute book, because all Liberals know how prone bigots are to prosecute and persecute anything new. They are the buzzards and hyenas of civilization. Everything has to become old and stinking before it becomes palatable food for them, and through them for anybody else if they could help it. And yet they lay claim to every reform that has taken place, while all history proves they fought every new idea just as long as there was any show to suppress it. It makes me mad to think they hav the effrontery to come in and claim they are the father of every new reform.

Is it not about time to take the timely warning of Jefferson and Madison, viz., "We should take alarm at the least encroachments upon our liberties," and "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty?" But I predict that the majority of Liberals will never wake up from their lethargy until they are almost bound hand and foot. They are just as much bound to their idols as the Christians are, viz., "our party." The facts are, a person that has a religious creed or a political creed is not a Liberal. A true Liberal will confer with all other Liberals and then pull together. And the experience of the Alliance proves how much can be accomplished if we will "only stick." And unless the above movement shows more of a disposition to carry out the most important Demand, viz., "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," it would be a good idea for Liberals not to become wedded to it. There were, no doubt, some Liberals in the Kansas legislature, but they never raised their voices against the passage of such a law, on the plea that there was such a few of them they were powerless to do anything. But everybody knows by experience that it is surprising what a few men or women can do if they hav only got the backbone to stand up and defend the right. One person in the right ought to be able to put a multitude to flight. Liberals must remember that they are the pioneers of progress, and they are out of their sphere to become orthodox for one moment in any direction. Do not wait for the procession to catch up unless "it is going your way." I do not believe that we will ever accomplish the Nine Demands of Liberalism until we organize a political party for that purpose. The body politic never makes any concessions until some organization shows fight. Then it will concede something to that organization. We need not fear that everything will go to the dogs while we are bringing about another reform, because there are enough constitutional laws and precedents to hold them in check.

In the good old times of kings it was much easier to unite church and state than at present. All that was necessary then was to convert the monarch. So like causes produce like effects, and as progression is abroad in the land, unless we revert back to the old system of the priest behind the throne to suppress all progression there is no cause of fear. So these barriers in their way will giv us ample time to popularize our cause, and we hav a very encouraging future before us. To allow the Christians the very outside figure, they hav the cheek to claim 18,000,000, and that leaves 47,000,000 outside the church. There are a very large per cent of their number that are in favor of our Demands, while we know we are sure to proselyte a vast number of the remainder. Why, some of the best workers we hav in our ranks used to be Christians, and we are certain of those outside the church, and then why not make the effort, when it is only a question of time? JOHN W. ABBOTT.

RICEVILLE, IA., March 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Let Mr. Heston keep on with the pictures. I vote for the pictures every time. Mr. Heston's picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 14th, entitled, "The Chief Object of Christian Worship," conveys more ideas to one's mind than a written volume. The truth of the above-mentioned picture was well manifested to me a little while ago, when I attended the services in the Baptist church of this place. They had a grand rally to make a raise of money, and they passed envelopes around for the faithful to put their offerings in and then put them in the contribution-box. The following are some of the maxims printed on the envelopes: "Giv for Christ's sake;" "The liberal soul shall be made fat," which should read, "The liberal church-member makes the preacher fat," and again: "God loveth a cheerful giver," which should read, "The preacher loveth a cheerful giver."

I was amused by reading an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER stating that the holy coat of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin (?) Mary, will be exhibited during the summer in Treves. In the year 1844 the coat of Christ was exhibited in Treves, and a few years later his shoes were exhibited in a town called Pruem, near Treves, and I would not be at all surprised if, in the near future, the Catholic authorities would exhibit in Treves the nightskirt of the "blessed Virgin Mary," and the wonderful swaddling-cloth of the infant Jesus, mentioned in the Apocryphal New Testament. There is no end of holy humbug in the Roman Catholic church.

I hav read Wm. Hart's book, "The Candle from Under the Bushel." I pronounce it the strongest argument against the Bible and the Christian religion I ever saw. The book would be cheap at $1. Every Liberal should hav it.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a terror to snakes—I should say, preachers. A few weeks ago I was in a certain place of business in this town, and amongst the crowd present was the Methodist preacher. I pulled a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER out of my pocket, evidently to seek cause for an argument with the preacher, but as soon as the preacher had a glimpse of the terrible sheet he disappeared.

There are two female preachers in this town and neighborhood. A Mrs. Van Aukin is holding Free Methodist meetings in country school-houses, and is causing great excitement, and a Mrs. Hinkley is preaching in the Congregational church. I wonder if these female preachers ever take their text from the epistle of Paul, where he says, "Allow not woman to speak in church," etc.

A few weeks ago it leaked out that a certain preacher of Brownsdale, Minn., had been in the Holy Ghost business and caused the ruin of one of his fair church-members, a girl sixteen years old. I understand that M. E. Billings has joined the church. Well, if he has, we need not mourn over his departure from our ranks, but somebody should continue the good work he left and publish new editions of "Crimes of Preachers," for I consider it the duty of every honest Freethinker to expose the foul deeds of the sky-pilots and wolves in sheep's clothing.

A month or so ago, a woman spoke to me about as follows: "Say, you wicked Infidel, don't you know that the devil has been born up in Minnesota, and if you don't become a Christian and join the church, he will get you sure?" And then she went on to describe him, saying he had hair all over, and that he had horns, and a tail sixteen inches long, and that he was jumping around town and raising hell in general, and that people could do nothing with him, and she said that it was surely so, because her brother had seen a man that had seen the young devil. I told the good woman that I had heard many a sermon preached about worse-looking devils than that, but that I was not losing any sleep about that either.

We had a fair sample of Christian love and humanity in this town last summer. A man by the name of D. Nicol was supporting his family, which consisted of his wife and five children, by running a billiard hall, but some good Christian swore out a warrant against him for running a nuisance, and a Christian judge sentenced him to three months' imprisonment in the county jail, and all the man was guilty of was that the majority of men of the town more frequently visited his hall than the churches. He was compelled to serve his time in jail last winter while his family were sick, and the youngest died before his term was expired. Such is Christian charity.

A few days ago a Christian friend of mine handed me a book, which he said would convert me and convince me that Ingersoll and Infidelity are wrong, and that the Bible and Christianity are true. The title of the book is, "Ingersoll Answered from the Bible and Ingersoll Against Himself. By Rev. O. M. Owen." I hav looked the book over carefully, and find nothing but bosh. Moral: Once a donkey kicked a lion, but the lion was not dead, but he evidently does not think it worth while to fight with such an ass as Rev. Mr. Owen.

I wish that Mr. Heston would design a picture representing a priest and a Catholic congregation in the act of cannibalism, i. e., holy communion. Every true Catholic has to eat his savior, God, man, and all. Can anything be more absurd than such cannibalistic ideas? And still there are millions who believe in that doctrin. Oh, what fools these mortals be! It is discouraging to see so many men who are professed unbelievers in the Christian doctrins and still do not support Freethought papers. THE TRUTH SEEKER should hav at least ten times as many subscribers as it has at present. I know about a dozen men in this town and neighborhood who are Freethinkers, and still I cannot induce one of them to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but some of them giv from $25 to $50 a year to support preachers and uphold churches, simply because they are church-members. How much more good those men would do if they only would spend their money for Liberal papers and Liberal and scientific books, instead of shoving it into the big pockets of pulpit-pounders. I remain,

Fraternally yours, HENRY BISSON.

CHICAGO, ILL., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The reasonable, common-sense article by one of your contributors—"In Search of a Spirit," by James Beck, March 21st—suggested many thoughts and reflections to my mind and recalled many experiences in my search for spirit, spiritual truth, and the raw article truth in its royal robes.

With your permission I will make a few plain statements and a proposition or two.

1. Modern Spiritualism (now nearly forty-three years old) came teaching and healing the sick, two quite important duties we all owe each other.

2. Modern spiritual teachings hav been superior teachings from the first. The external phenomena hav challenged the wisest men and women on earth to explain them upon any other hypothesis than the intelligence claimed for them, viz., that the intelligence that produced the rap, etc., through mediums, was the spirit of a former inhabitant of a physical form similar to our own. Further, these same intelligences, through their chosen instruments, hav given the world from the first superior lessons upon hundreds of the most important subjects which interest humanity in all ages of the world and conditions of life.

3. The scientists, the philosophers, the skeptics, and the clergy hav failed to explain the varied manifestations of modern Spiritualism.

4. Skeptic, scientist, and clergy (with a few noted and honorable exceptions) hav ignored, misrepresented, scoffed, persecuted, and played the hypocrit from the first to the present.

5. Spiritualism has never in a single instance asked anyone to believe upon faith or bare and barren statements of spirits or mortals, but has always offered tangible demonstration. At least ninety-five per cent of the million or more of converts in America hav been converted by absolute tests—demonstrations—and notwithstanding these patent facts, look at the position of many of our Liberal journals and public men; what does their position remind a truth seeker of? Base hypocrisy, rank and rotten deception, a brazen-faced ignoring, a childish evasion of truth as well demonstrated as life itself. What is the position of our Liberal men and press at this time? Is it manly, is it truthful? Does the sun shine? Do THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Boston Investigator, and a dozen lesser Liberal lights know that the sun shines? Can they demonstrate it to millions of intelligent people?

6. What does all this cry of fraud and fraudulent mediums signify? Is there more fraud in mediums than in church, state, business, or Liberal press? If so, show it up for humanity's sake. Does not this cry of fraud only signify a fear of truth? Do not the majority in the church, and out, prefer to go it blind rather than face the truth? Do we not all understand, who are really free, what this ignoring, this barefaced hypocrisy in church and among our very Liberal press, really means? Is it manly? Is it not childish and weak? Is it not about time to giv truth a fair show when it has asked and begged for over forty years to demonstrate the most important truth the world has ever grappled with?

7. Gentlemen and ladies of the so-called truth seeker class, can you much longer expect to be respected unless you respect truth and yourselvs? Hav you not toyed, played, and fooled with this great subject of modern Spiritualism about long enough? Can you not see plainly, as our brother James Beck has stated in the article referred to, "that Spiritualism has met so many enemies and survived all of them, and the more it is persecuted the more it seems to grow?" Is there no lesson for truth seekers in this? Just think of the three hundred clergymen and others who are about to investigate this subject, from their faith standpoint, of course; where will our Liberal friends stand after such a farce is concluded?

My proposition is to prove to any intelligent man or woman, using the same evidence that is used in business, government, and law courts:

1. That spirits of the so-called dead do return and communicate intelligently to their friends in physical form through mediums.

2. That spirits do materialize full forms that are recognized, and talk, sing, and manifest many attributes of humanity, and then disappear in full view of their friends. Further, these forms are photographed; these spirit intelligences telegraph to their friends; these spirits communicate to their friends upon closed slates under conditions precluding the possibility of fraud or deception.

3. If anyone desires I will show such evidence of many spiritual facts as will command respect from every truth seeker.

4. Conclusion: if Spiritualism is true, is it not of first importance? If it is not true, is it not the greatest of all delusions? If it is not true, can any one of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER prove to me that he livs at all, or that he knows anything? Can we not all see and understand that bigotry, hypocrisy, and evasion are not good-looking, no matter if labeled Liberal? Would it not be more in harmony with truth if the society of "Brotherhood of Moralists" would change their title as well as their methods? A moral courage society would sound well for Liberals.

I do not think there is a single excuse for one intelligent free man or woman in New York, Boston, or any of our Eastern cities denying the communion between this and the spirit world. Gross ignorance, prejudice, and bigotry may be an excuse, but blindness and deafness with a good pair of eyes and ears is not excusable.

Of course, no one is compelled to know; the Ingersolls, Investigators, and Truth Seekers may ignore—it is easy, and no courage is required so long as it is the order of the times—but remember, these are times of a spirit of restlessness; a crisis is near at hand; the farmers hav set the quack politicians all a-thinking; the spirit world, who are largely in the majority, will soon be heard and felt, and then will come a time when ignoring will be out of order.

Gentlemen of the Liberal label, it is just as consistent to ignore one truth as another; the popularity does not signify. Spiritualism is a fixed fact as much as sunshine, it is as patent as electricity, as well proved as any science, and is of more value to humanity than all the discoveries and inventions of the last forty years. Can you afford longer to ignore its truths? DR. M. E. CONGER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Grievous Complaint.

"It's hard on a fellow, I do declare!"
Said Tommy one day with a pout;
"In ev'ry one of the suits that I wear
The pockets are 'most worn out.
They're 'bout as big as the ear of a mole,
And I never hav more than three,
And there's always coming a mean little hole
That loses my knife for me.

"I can't make 'em hold but a few little things—
Some cookies, an apple or two,
A knife and pencil and bunch of strings,
Some nails and maybe a screw,
And marbles of course, and a top and ball,
And shells and pebbles and such,
And some odds and ends—yes, honest, that's all!
You can see for yourself 'tisn't much.

"I'd like a suit of some patent kind,
With pockets made wide and long;
Above and below and before and behind,
Sewed extra heavy and strong.
I'd want about a dozen or so,
All easy and quick to get at;
And I should be perfectly happy, I know,
With a handy rig like that."

Bad Lands of Dakota.

A friend passing through the bad lands of Dakota writes as follows:

These bad lands are wonderful sights to behold. Abruptly, with one step, you think yourself on another, but unfinished, planet, so narrowly defined is the line between the surface of our earth from that of the bad lands. I don't know how to describe these lands. It is somewhat like the sea in a storm, but not as regular as waves. Such grotesque forms! Columns, pillars, cones, gates, round towers, steeples, beehives—all possible imaginary forms, jumbled and bundled together in an indescribable conglomeration. It is all so strange, surprising, and, withal, so fascinating and attractiv. It holds one spell-bound, as it were, and you almost expect to see gnomes, fairies, ghouls, and other uncanny creatures popping up from behind these curious and startling forms.

Why are these bad lands here? What sudden freak of nature tossed up these uncouth formations? What stories and histories lie hidden beneath these strange formations? Did once the deep sea flow on over these bare and barren spaces? Are extinguished cities buried underneath, and are these the unread monuments that some one shall decipher? Who knows?

Preferred to Be With Papa.

One of the best children's bon mots is told by a well-known bookmaker in town. His little daughter was happy amid a parlorful of company when bedtime came, and she rebelled against having to leave. She threw herself on the floor, face down, and kicked and screamed. "Come," said her mother, "be a good little girl, now, and go to bed. Don't you know what mamma has always told you—if you aren't a good little girl you can't go to heaven?" "I don't want to go to heaven," said the child; "I want to go where papa goes."

Ida and the Orange Seed.

"Here is a nice sweet orange for you," said nurse to little Ida one day; "but be sure not to swallow the seeds."

Ida made a little hole in the orange and began to suck it. It was very juicy, and she liked it very much. But when she was almost through with it, she happened to swallow a seed.

She ran to Nurse Mary at once to tell her about it.

"Will it grow inside of me, nurse?" she asked.

Nurse Mary laughed. "Wait and see," she said. "If you find a little orange-tree coming up, you must tell me."

One morning Ida's mother saw her standing before a mirror with her mouth wide open. She was trying to see down her throat.

"What are you doing, Ida?" asked her mother.

"I'm looking for my orange-tree," answered Ida, tears in her brown eyes; "I'm afraid it will choke me when it comes up."

Mamma did not know what Ida meant, and she laughed very much when the little girl told her about the seed she had swallowed. She told Ida there was no danger that a tree would grow from it.

But it was a long time before Ida forgot what nurse had said, and for many weeks she was often seen standing before a mirror with her mouth wide open, looking for that orange-tree which might come up after all.

Chats with Correspondents.

JOHN J. D.—You know what Davy Crockett said: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead." It is the best advice we can giv.

CAROLINE.—Do not be impatient. "All things come round to him who will but wait." The truth may be pushed aside but cannot be crushed.

GEO. W. K., Kent, Ia.—It has been thought not advisable to do anything about the matter you so kindly write about. The amount we could raise that way would be so very small, and many dislike to hav such business urged upon the children.

UNCLE JACK, Dallas, Tex.—Your story is good, but it is rather long for the space at our command. You see we hav only a little to spare. Short stories, short sketches, short articles, are always in order. However, we will keep it and see if it can some time be used.

DAVID S., Missoula, Mont.—Ella E. Gibson is editor of the organ of the Brotherhood of Moralists. Her address is Barre, Mass., and the price of the paper is $1 per year. You are justified in saying that real Liberals are moral and that they obey the health laws. Of course there are many inheritances that hav to be overcome, but, as a rule, Liberals, they who are worthy of the name, endeavor to liv moral, upright, and honorable lives.

ROSE TAYLOR, Denver, Col.—You inquire about our book, "Summer Days at Onset." It is descriptiv, legendary, and is illustrated. Yes, it tells about Onset. It is in pamphlet form and sells at the low price of twenty-five cents. The editor of the Corner will be happy to fill any orders addressed to her, or it can be ordered through the Truth Seeker Company, as can also her other books, "Apples of Gold," "All in a Lifetime," and "The Story Hour," all good and useful books, and entirely devoid of superstition.

Correspondence.

MILFORD, MASS., March 8, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Corner for the first time. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER nine years, and likes it very much. I will be twelve years old the 27th of this month. I go to school and study spelling, reading, arithmetic, writing, geography, grammar, and drawing. My teacher's name is Miss Wilson. Hoping to see this in print, I remain, Yours truly, ROSA MOREY.

[We are glad to greet Rosa, and hope she will come and see us in the Corner again soon.—ED. C. C.]

STILLWATER, MONT., March 8, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw a few letters of the children in THE TRUTH SEEKER which I read at a neighbor's house, and so I concluded I would write to you also.

My father is a cowman and livs two miles from Stillwater town. We liv on a farm and raise a few crops every year, just enough for our own use and just a little to sell.

I hav six brothers and sisters. We hav only a few neighbors out in this uninhabited part of the country. There are very few city-bred people here. If I am not mistaken, everybody here was born here or somewhere near.

I hope my letter won't go in the waste-basket, as some of the others hav.

Good-bye. Hoping to see this in print soon, I remain,

Your affectionate, MARY E. SHANE.

McCUNE, KAN., March 12, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Corner. My folks are mostly Liberals—grandpa and grandma, my father and mother, nearly all my uncles and aunts. We read THE TRUTH SEEKER. Grandpa had taken it for a long time before I was born. I am eleven years old. I hav two sisters and one brother. I had a twin brother who died when he was seven years old. We like the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Grandpa got the picture book; we hav it at our house. We children spend lots of time looking at the pictures. I am on a visit now at grandpa's. I was reading the letters in the Children's Corner last night. I think the letters real good. This is my first letter I ever wrote to hav published, and I hope you will not put it in the stove, for I would like to read it in the Corner.

Your little friend, HALLIE GOWIN.

DALLAS, TEX., Feb. 11, 1891.

DEAR CORNER: I often think of the little TRUTH SEEKER folks all along the line, and it occurred to me that C stands for children and many other words of significant meaning which I will present: Cradle, caress, cooing, conscience, confiding, cunning, creatures, curious, captivating; apt to love cake, candy, comfits; may be made consistent, courteous, capable, or perverted to cunning, crafty, cruel, corrupt, conspiring; if they are surrounded by truthful and honest examples they become truthful and honest. It is just as easy to teach a child courtesy, and a light, gliding, elastic step, as to teach it to double its fist and strike, or be rude and shuffling in its walk. It is less trouble to teach the beautiful than to inflict coarseness. Children are just what we make them to be. Let every parent and child be taught by this last assertion. UNCLE JACK.

CISNE, ILL., March 16, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt to write to the Corner. My father died before I was born. I now liv with my mother, and stepfather, B. S. Jones, who has renewed his subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was very glad he did, for I like to read the Corner better than the "Holy Bible," for there are more truths in it to my knowledge.

I am a strong Freethinker. If I can't get to heaven without being baptized and paying the preacher, I think I shall hav to go to the other place. I was present at a big revival not long ago. It was a very disgusting place; the people howled, jumped, sang, and prayed loud enough to be heard two miles away. It was too disgusting a meeting for civilized people to attend. I only went three times. It resembled the picture shown in the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-book" of the monkeys.

For fear of taking up too much space, I will close, hoping to see this in print.

Your fifteen-year-old Freethinker,
WILLIAM J. PRIDE.

NETTLETON, MO., March 17, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few letters to the Corner. I like the Corner and the children's letters. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years. He says he cannot do without it. I enjoy reading the Corner and looking at the pictures.

I am twelve years of age. Our school began September 1st. We had a six months' term. I hav but a quarter of a mile to go, for the school-house is on papa's land. My studies are history, arithmetic, geography, physiology, grammar, spelling, and writing. I only went half of the term; mamma was sick, and I had to stay home and wait on her. She took sick on the Fourth of July, and is still bedfast.

Papa bought me "The Story Hour," which I enjoy reading.

I hav seven pets: two canaries, one redbird, a little lamb, and three calves. I hav a sister and two brothers. As this is my first letter to the Corner, I hope it will not be thrown in the waste-basket. I remain,

Your friend, PEMMA M. PAWSEY.

RICHMOND, VA., March 12, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you are always interested in hearing from Freethinking friends, I know you will be glad to hear from me. We last night had the pleasure of hearing that noble Free lecturer, J. E. Remsburg. He gave the lecture, "The Apostle of Liberty." The two leading papers to-day contained about three-quarters of a column about it. The Times gave a very good account of it; but the Dispatch erred from the truth by saying, "In talking of the 'bigots' who 'slimed up' the dead man's memory, the lecturer was unusually abusiv and severe." There are but few outspoken Freethinkers here, consequently the audience was small, though it was highly appreciativ of all given. This is the first lecture of the kind ever given in this city; but if my father and mother stay here, it will certainly not be the last. This is a very orthodox community, and the people can find but little else to talk about but church, Sunday-school, etc. I hav two brothers and one sister, and we are all Freethinkers. I am seventeen, and am an operator for the Postal Telegraph Cable Co. I saw in the Corner that you are thinking of getting up a Freethought paper for little Freethinkers, and I sincerely hope you will succeed, and I shall be very happy to assist in any way I can. If I was as well informed as Mr. Remsburg's son George, I should contribute an article to its columns every week. We hav been here but five months from St. Joseph, Mo., and we like the West much the best, as there are more Liberal, thinking people there.

Thinking my letter long enough for this time, and wishing success to the Corner, yourself, and the prospectiv children's paper, I remain,

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,
RAYMOND J. COLE.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

HOW TO PRESERVE HEALTH.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

CONTENTS:

The Prevention of Disease—Hygiene of Different Organs—Age and Occupation—The Dwelling—The Care of the Sick—Nursing—The Family Physician—How to Giv Aid in Emergencies—Contagious and Miasmatic Diseases—Diseases of the Nervous System—Altered Nutrition—The Respiratory and Digestiv and Urinary Tracts—The Skin—Parasites—Motherhood.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College, N. Y., says: "I regard your book, 'How to Preserve Health,' as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav ever met. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family and in the library of every school, for I think it would popularize a vast amount of important and useful knowledge, and thus be of great service to the community. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it; that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging, which our anxious grandmothers and others lacking the requisit elementary knowledge are too prone to indulge in, and oftentimes do great harm thereby. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

John B. Hamilton, M.D., Surgeon-General of the Navy, and Professor of Surgery, Georgetown University: "I thank you for the excellent book, 'How to Preserve Health.' I hav no doubt of the necessity of such books, and yours is of such merit that it will surely be successful."

Samuel Sherwell, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Skin, Brooklyn: "Your excellent treatise, entitled 'How to Preserve Health,' appears to me admirably adapted for the reading of the laity, correcting as it does a large number of false impressions that prevail among them. The direct suggestions, as in remarks on the skin, are of decided value."

THE

French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1 50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparative oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail to receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Price $1.50. News of the Week.

THE Italian government being forced, by fear of papists at home and papal instigation of other nations to war against Italy, to levy taxes that impoverish her masses, the pope takes advantage of this to condole with the poverty-stricken, and has issued ten thousand soup-tickets in Rome.

THE Massachusetts senate has refused municipal woman suffrage by a vote of 22 to 9.

SPRINGFIELD, O., Protestants and Catholics are attempting union, and holding joint meetings.

THE Indians remain dissatisfied, and their condition continues unsettled by the government. Settlers fear outbreaks. General Miles says: "This is not the last of the Indian wars. There will be many more. The same causes which produced this one will bring about others."

THE "manna" which fell from the sky in Asia Minor last August, and was baked into bread, has been identified as lichen by scientists.

NEBRASKA railway employees, fearing reduction of wages, hav petitioned against the bill limiting freight rates which passed the legislature and awaits the governor's signature.

A REVISED call for a third party convention at Cincinnati May 19th has been issued by the Farmers' Alliance, inviting the American Federation of Labor, the Federation of Railway Employees, and the Nationalists.

THE struggle of the miners of the United States for eight hours began on the 1st. At Mt. Pleasant, Pa., 500 strikers attempting to wreck property were fired on by 65 deputy sheriffs, and 10 were killed and 40 wounded.

A NEW French law empowers courts, in certain offenses, to postpone sentences for first offenses five years in hope of reformation, and if there is no second offense, the sentence is then void. Second offenses are to be visited with severity.

AT St. Matthew's church, Washington, D.C., on the 27th ult., Louis Dewees ascended the altar until in front of the figure of the crucifixion, when he faced the congregation, dashed down his coat and umbrella, and shouted, "I am a disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. I hav come to save ye sinners." He was confined. He had been reading the Bible closely for some time previous.

A ROME dispatch says that additional anticlerical laws hav gone into effect, suppressing religious guilds and fraternities and abolishing chaplains in hospitals, asylums, and prisons. The 5 300 masses celebrated in Rome each Sunday hav been reduced to 800, and 152 churches will be closed and their altars demolished. The pictures and statues, except some reserved for public galleries, will be sold at auction.

IN resentment of the New Orleans lynching Italy last week recalled her minister at Washington, Baron Fava, as though contemplating war, but Premier Rudini now cables pacific sentiments. He urges, however, that the lynchers be punished. The governor of Louisiana after a week's delay replied to Secretary Blaine with a bare statement of previously known facts, expressing no regret and giving no assurance that the lynchers will be punished. The letter disappointed the state department and incensed Italians. Catholics resent this remark by Mayor Shakspeare of New Orleans about Father Manoritta, editor of the Gazetta Cattolica, the Italian paper of that city: "I can tell you that the Italian consul is himself in pretty bad company. At least so I am told. That little priest—what's his name?—Manoritta, is a bad man."

Gems of Thought.

LET us for fifty years study heredity, and leave theology alone; and at the end of the five decades our doxology will be a victorious pean over the vanquishing of Disease and Crime.—Saladin.

THAT man, I think, has had a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will; whose intellect is a clear, cold logic engin; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature and of the laws of her operations; one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art; to hate all violence, and to respect others as himself.—Professor Huxley.

THAT in the world accessible to man's experience no supernatural fact takes place is a truth which imposes itself more and more on the conscience of mankind. Men, nowadays, pray less and less; for they know that no prayer was ever effectiv. . . . If ever there were a deity whose power was established by documents apparently irrefutable, it was the goddess Rabbat Tanit, of Carthage. Nearly three thousand stelæ "bear-witness" to vows made to that goddess hav been excavated; they are now, for the most part, preserved in the National Library at Paris. Each and all state that Rabbat Tanit heard the prayers addressed to her. These three thousand witnesses to a prayer having secured its object certainly deceived themselvs; for, indeed, Rabbat Tanit, being a false deity, never could grant anyone's prayer.—Renan.

I HONOR any man, anywhere, who, in the conscientious discharge of what he believes to be his duty, dares to stand alone.—Charles Sumner.

I CANNOT forbear observing a fact which may be worth the attention of such as make human nature the object of their inquiry. It is certain that in every religion, however sublime the verbal definition it givs of its divinity, many of the votaries—perhaps the greatest number—will still seek divine favor, not by virtue and good morals, which alone can be acceptable to a perfect being, but either by frivolous observances, by intemperate zeal, by rapturous ecstasies, or by the belief of mysterious and absurd opinions. The least part of the Sadder (an abridgment of the Zendavesta, in the modern Persian language), as well as of the Pentateuch, consists in precepts of morality; and we may also be assured that that part was always the least observed and regarded. When the old Romans were attacked with a pestilence they never ascribed their sufferings to their vices, or dreamed of repentance and amendment. They never thought that they were the general robbers of the world, whose ambition and avarice made the earth desolate and reduced opulent nations to want and beggary. They only created a dictator in order to drive a nail into a door, and by that means they thought that they had sufficiently appeased their incensed deity.—Hume.

WE are all short-sighted, and very often see but one side of the matter. Our views are not extended to all that has a connection with it. From this defect I think no man is free. We see but in part, and we know but in part; and, consequently, it is no wonder we conclude not right from our partial views. This might instruct the proudest esteemer of his own parts how useful it is to talk and consult with each other, even such as come short of him in capacity, quickness, and penetration; for, since no one sees all, and we generally hav different prospects of the same thing according to our different, as I may say, positions to it, it is not incongruous to think, nor beneath any man to try, whether another may not hav notions of things which hav escaped him, and which his reason would make use of if they came into his mind.—Locke.

OH, for a man that will stand up and say: I want to be good, honest, virtuous, and upright, loving my neighbor as myself, helping my fellow-man along the rugged road of life, simply from a love of doing these things for their own sake, and not because he fears eternal torture in hell and hopes for a reward of a golden crown in heaven!—Thomas Paine.

FAITH AND REASON—OR TASTES NATURAL AND UNNATURAL.

Notes and Clippings.

"If you want to grow rich," said an aged thinker to a business man who was about to start a factory, "make it a rule to giv the largest possible amount of goods of the best possible quality for the least possible sum of money." The business man took the advice, and it worked so well that he soon bought out the factory of a rival, whose rule had been to get the largest possible sum of money for the least possible amount of goods of the poorest possible quality.

The New Orleans Picayune says: "Vital to the Christian religion as is the fact of the birth and ministration of its founder, it is inconceivably more important to hold to the fact of his resurrection after death. That is the foundation stone of the church. The resurrection must be accepted as a fact. There can be no question that this is the position taken by the founders of Christianity, nor any shadow of doubt that this is the point of attack selected by the shrewdest opponents of Christianity to-day. Huxley and Ingersoll, et id genus omne, strike straight at this every time. And here is where the Newtons and MacQuearys and Lyman Abbotts are doing the religion that they profess to believe and to teach the greatest possible harm. In giving away the fact for which Easter stands, they cut the cable of faith that anchors the church to certitude, and allow her to drift hopelessly into the breakers of speculation on the sands of doubt."

Studious Youth writes to ask what induced the whale to eliminate Jonah from his internal economy. Maybe the gleeful boy considers this a joke, but we do not, and neither would Jonah if the question were submitted to him. On entering the domain of speculation upon the question a number of good and valid reasons for the eccentricity of the leviathan present themselvs. Perhaps Jonah tried to smoke a cigaret; peradventure he whistled a couple of bars of "Annie Rooney;" maybe he slapped the fish on the liver and asked him if he was "having much fun;" he might hav claimed that his stateroom was too close to the boiler; maybe he recited "'Ostler Joe" and made the whale sick; like enough he refused to tip the waiters and got starved out. Should none of these suggestions commend themselvs to our juvenil interlocutor he might obtain further information by communication with the fish editor of the New York Tribune.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Mrs. Mary Lease, of Kansas, the heretical lady who has made a national reputation for herself in her support of the Farmers' Alliance, addressed an audience of good size at Music Hall yesterday afternoon. Here is a representativ bunch of some of her sayings: "I defy any Republican or Democrat to giv a reason why he is a Democrat or Republican except that his daddy was one." "The men who hovered near the Canadian line and never smelled war in all their cowardly lives are the men who hav kept the North and South apart." "Which is the worst, the black slavery of the past or the white slavery of the present?" "The West and South are two peas in the same pod." "Republicans always say that Democrats are corrupt, and should hav no place on the face of the earth. Democrats say the same thing of the Republicans. We will satisfy both of them by taking charge ourselvs." "The difference between the two dominant parties is that one is in and the other wants to get in." "We asked for the earth in Kansas, and we nearly got it." "The Alliance plow is strong enough to turn a furrow and hide both of the old parties from the light of day."—Kansas City Times.

John Brisben Walker, editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine, delivered before the Seminarians at the Washington Catholic University on the 18th ult., an address which is creating much remark. He himself, he said, was a strict Catholic, and it was with the utmost reverence for the church that he called to account some of its priesthood for their disposition to toady to the wealthy for the sake of policy. He opened his broadside by saying that fully one-half of the sins revealed in the confessional, or that were kept from the confessional, were the direct result of either extreme poverty or of great wealth; that the clergy of the church were getting too much within the influence of the rich and too far away from the poor. If the clergy preferred to enjoy the luxuries of life, to become portly, well-fed gentlemen, their ministrations were practically useless, because they were then out of the reach of the people. In the Middle Ages, Mr. Walker said, it was common for weak bishops and other priests of the church to stand at the portals of the castle and chant in holy forms the praises of the mailed robber baron as he returned with his retainers laden with ill-gotten booty, and so now, he added, it is too often the case that the clergy are eager to sing the praises and to win the favor of the robber baron, the millionaire of the present day.

A dispatch from Ottawa on the 5th instant to the daily press says: "Canada may now hav on her hands a big religious fight, as well as a political one, over the Manitoba school act. Cardinal Taschereau and the entire Roman Catholic hierarchy hav entered upon a war against it, and in all their churches to-day a joint mandement signed by them was read. The act in question prohibits religious instruction in public schools in Manitoba, making them all non-sectarian as in the United States, and was passed by the legislature of Manitoba. The hierarchy insists that the government of Canada must veto the act, and the result of the mandement must be to form Canadian Catholics into an almost compact body in support of this course. Catholic members of the new parliament will be largely influenced by the mandement, and in view of the reduced majority for the government at Ottawa the situation in which Sir John will find himself cannot fail to be critical, for it will become a question of expediency, and while the people of Manitoba claim the right to manage their own affairs, and the Protestant electors as a rule throughout Canada take the same stand, and while the Roman Catholic church on the other hand hold that the act is a violation of vested and sacred rights, Sir John will certainly count noses and decide upon the course that will expose him to the least possible loss of support. Only a few weeks remain of the period within which the act may be disallowed at Ottawa. Sir John's friends here think he may evade the question by referring the constitutionality of the act to the supreme court."

Canada—The Coming Issue.

Annexation of Canada to the United States appears to be daily increasing in probability and nearness. The event will be in importance to this nation—in pregnancy of effect on its future—scarcely second to any that has taken place during its existence. It will be of especial consequence and interest to Freethinkers. In THE TRUTH SEEKER we hav from time to time given particulars as to our northern neighbor. Desiring, however, that what we believe to be the coming issue par excellence—the vital theme of conversation for some decades next—be made still more fully familiar to the Freethinkers of America, and ambitious to maintain a reputation of being the first to post our patrons on the outlook of the hour, we hav prosecuted some considerable researches into the subject, and take pleasure in submitting the results.

HISTORY AND GOVERNMENT.

The country entitled the Dominion of Canada differs widely in extent from the province so known before 1867. Previous to that date the name of Canada designated a territory of but moderate proportions—about 1,400 miles in length and 200 to 400 miles in width, the area being about 331,220 miles. Alongside of it lay the independent British provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, while beyond it to the north and west lay the vast region known as the British Northwest Territory, abandoned to the Hudson's Bay Company. Now, however, the Dominion of Canada comprehends nearly the whole of the sections just named. Other changes hav been made. From the wide extent of the Northwest Territory two strips, British Columbia and Manitoba, hav been subtracted, and erected into separate provinces. The names of Upper and Lower Canada hav been changed to Ontario and Quebec. The Dominion now stretches across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean and embraces an area of about 3,500,000 square miles, surpassing the 3,026 494 square miles of the United States if Alaska be excluded.

The federated Dominion contains about four million three hundred thousand inhabitants, exclusiv of the Indians of the Northwest Territory. Ontario and Quebec are the most populous members of the federation, and they are the ones that hav made such trouble in the past as to hav induced perpetual changes of government in the effort to keep them in peace. The great body of the Protestants inhabit Ontario. The Roman Catholics, numbering about one and one-half million, dwell chiefly in Quebec. The latest exact enumerations are as follows: In 1870 the four original provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, 3 484 924. In 1870, Manitoba, 11,953 In 1871, British Columbia, 50 000. In 1871, Northwest Territory, 28,700. Total of Dominion in 1871, 3 575 577. Total of Indians in 1871, 86,543. In 1861 there were in the four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, 1 372 913 Roman Catholics, 471,946 Presbyterians, 465,572 Anglicans, 431 927 Wesleyans and Methodists, 189,080 Baptists, 29,651 Lutherans, and 17,757 Congregationalists.

On the cession of Canada to Great Britain in 1763, the province of Lower Canada, as it was then called, was allowed a license rare in that intolerant age, in privileges permitted its Catholic religion. Further, and, it is now said by Protestants, unwise, powers were given that faith by the "Quebec Act" of 1774. Thus Quebec has continued under a hierarchical sway that has kept it markedly distinct in creed and general sentiment from its sister provinces, and it has been the leaven that has kept the whole country about it in a ferment of dissension for a century. In the first decade of the present century trouble had already made its appearance, in vehement opposition throughout Lower Canada to public education, which Parliament wished to establish. Sectarian antagonism continued activ up to 1841, but it was, however, secondary during this period to race and commercial hostility. These differences combined brought matters to such a pass that in 1841 it was admitted on all sides that Upper and Lower Canada could not exist side by side under separate provincial governments. The expedient was then tried of uniting them under one government. The union which was thus formed might hav prospered, and the English and French hav gradually coalesced into one harmonious people, but for the difficulty which difference of religion now threw in the way. The constitution of this union had succeeded in adjusting commercial and all other points in such a way as to secure fair satisfaction on both sides, but on the one rock of religion this promising embarkation was wrecked. The religious contention took the form of a fight over religion in education. "The difference between the character, sentiments, and views of British Upper Canada and French Lower Canada," says one account, "was displayed especially on the subject of education. The majority of the Upper Provinces was in favor of free non-sectarian schools, under governmental and municipal control; the majority of the Lower Province, or at least the hierarchy that controled that majority, contended for sectarian schools, under ecclesiastical supervision. . . . There was continuous battle and legislation over the school question for years. The endeavor to unite the provinces educationally, as they were politically, was frustrated by the influence brought to bear by the hierarchy on the French Canadian and Catholic representativs, who, though in a minority, were, owing to party divisions among the British and Protestant representativs, enabled to throw their support on the side of the party in power, and thus exercise a control on legislation. The sectional strife produced such bitter feeling, and such frequent ministerial crises, as to make government almost impossible. At length, in 1864, the leading men of all parties stopped to consider seriously the position." In the language of another describer, "matters were brought practically to a deadlock." A proposal was now made to substitute a federal, instead of a legislativ, union. Many in the British and Protestant provinces of Upper Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick would hav preferred to continue a legislativ union, but Lower Canada stood in the way. "Her leaders," says a writer in Macmillan's Magazine, "would hav nothing but a federal union which should giv to the local legislature, where the French and Catholic element would be all-predominant, the guardianship of her peculiar institutions." The work of constituting a federal union, "similar," it was provided, "in principle to that of the United Kingdom," was now prosecuted. The union was consummated in 1871. Thus, as at present constituted, the Dominion of Canada has a central government at Ottawa, and is composed of the provinces of Nova Scotia (including Cape Breton), New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia, and the Northwest Territory. Newfoundland still remains without the confederation, and directly subject to the British government. Its legislature declared in favor of joining the Dominion, but the people in November, 1869, voted against it by a large majority. The federal government consists of the queen, the Senate, and the House of Commons. The queen is represented by the governor-general, who is paid by Canada a salary of $50,000 a year. He has his personal staff and is aided and advised by a council, called the queen's privy council of Canada, thirteen members constituting the ministry, who must be sustained by a parliamentary majority. The English model is exactly followed. The provinces are miniature copies of the Dominion government. Each has a lieutenant-governor, and each has an electiv assembly, which assembly in most cases has two houses.

THE PROTESTANT PROVINCE.

The province of Ontario is as hopelessly sunk in Protestant ignorance and bigotry as Quebec in Roman Catholic. The capital city of this province, Toronto, is spread over a very large area, yet it permits no horse cars to run on Sunday. There are no Sunday newspapers. All business is stopped on the Sabbath. One would imagin, on listening to the Protestants of the Dominion, that the Catholics are the only offenders in the article of intolerance. Yet the complainers themselvs are equally guilty in bigotry and barbarism. Most Freethinkers will recall the violent handling experienced in 1888 by a Liberal lecturer at Grand Manan, New Brunswick, in which attempts were made that might hav resulted in his death. A short time ago copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" were seized by the customs officers at Toronto and Montreal, and it was declared that the book could not be imported into Canada, as it is "immoral and obscene." Freethought is well-nigh unheard of throughout the Protestant as well as the Catholic portions of Canada. The Protestants exclaim against Catholicism in schools, yet insist that their own sectarianism be there inculcated. In Ontario the public schools are avowedly Protestant, and in management connected with the Protestant clergy. The best satisfaction got by the Catholics in this province is that they are not compelled to send their children to these public Protestant schools, but are suffered to support separate schools of their own faith if they wish. The extent to which the dominant sect here imposes its exercises upon the common schools, may be seen from the words used by Charles Dudley Warner, a late traveler through the region: "In Ontario the Christian religion is fundamental in the educational system." The mandatory regulations of the provincial Assembly are of this nature: Every public and high school shall be opened daily with the reading of the scriptures and the Lord's prayer, or the prayer authorized by the department of education. A volume of scripture selections made up by clergymen of the various denominations on the Bible may be used, in the discretion of the trustees, who may also order the repeating of the Ten Commandments in the school at least once a week. Clergymen of any denomination, or their authorized representativs, shall hav the right to giv religious instruction to pupils of their denomination in the school-house at least once a week. The historical portions of the Bible are to be given with more fulness than the others.

THE CATHOLIC PROVINCE.

We now come to view the province which is accorded at Rome that distinction in North America which among European nations is expressed by the envied designation, "the eldest son of the church." "The province of Quebec," says Charles Lindsey, "is now among the most demonstrativ in its obedience to Rome."

Favorers of Canada desire to hav it pass that that land has in none of its provinces what is called a state church, or an established church. It has not, to be sure, in certain senses of the phrases; but it has in Quebec what practically amounts to such an institution. Says one report: "The Vatican is the real ruler of Canada East [Quebec]." Says the Episcopal bishop Usher, of Montreal: "In the province of Quebec the church of Rome is practically the state church." Says Professor Goldwin Smith, of Toronto: "The church in French Canada is virtually established." In the province the priest meddles with the private daily life of all his parishioners, and exercises a sway as autocratic as that of his medieval predecessor in Europe. Any peasant who fails to secure his goodwill becomes subject to a general dislike and persecution as effectual to coerce conformity and submission as were the methods of the state churches of the Middle Ages. It was in Quebec that, not many years ago, Bibles disbursed to the nativs by Protestant colporteurs were wrenched from their owners by priestly hands and publicly burnt. The Roman Catholic church was given, a century ago, authority to collect by law tithes from every adherent of its faith, and the right also to levy the additional taxes called "fabrique" for ecclesiastical edifices, including churches, priests' houses, etc. It was empowered to order the metes and bounds of parishes. "The Quebec act," which conferred these powers, "is now seen," says an Ottawa correspondent, "to hav been a fatal mistake."

The wealth of the Roman Catholic church in the province of Quebec alone has by one calculator been estimated at $80,000,000. This is made up of nine hundred churches, valued at $37,000,000; nine hundred parsonages, together with the palaces of the cardinal and the archbishops, whose value is $900,000; twelve seminaries worth $600,000; seventeen classical colleges, $850,000; two hundred and fifty-nine boarding-schools and academies, $6,000,000; eighty convents, $4 000,000; sixty-eight hospitals and asylums, $4,000,000, and two million one hundred and seventeen thousand acres of land, the gift of the state in 1857. The yearly revenue is estimated by the Rev. J. R. Black, of Barrie, Ontario, at $8,000,000, as follows: Two hundred thousand farms under cultivation giving a total yield of thirty-one million two hundred and eighty thousand bushels, whose value is $18 000,000, and upon which the church tithe is $700,000; taxes on families not possessing land, $300,000; pew rents, fees for marriages, baptisms, funerals, and masses, $2,000,000; voluntary gifts, legacies, income from land owned by the church, $3,000,000; taxes for the maintenance and construction of ecclesiastical edifices, $2,000,000. These items do not include the wealth of the numerous ecclesiastical orders, and it is known that some of these are very rich. The Sulpicians own some of the most valuable business property in Montreal, and their wealth perhaps exceeds that of any corporation on the continent.

A later computation, however, declares that the holdings of the church and her orders, including sacred edifices, priests' houses, bishops' residences, convents, seminaries, hospitals, with the real estate attached to these structures, and in the form of farm, town, and city property, amount to between $90,000,000 and $110,000,000. By the same calculation it is estimated that the revenue from all sources, including tithes, fabrique taxes, sacramental fees, ordinary dues, pew rents, revenue from real property, from mortgages, and general investments, amounts to not less than $10,000,000, and probably more than $12,000,000. The hardship of so heavy a tax as this on the scanty substance of the French Canadian peasant, is very great. It keeps him in deprivation, without any of the modern appliances of luxury or art or civilization, and without books or papers even if he were in rare cases disposed toward these latter.

The grinding oppression of the clergy of France before the Revolution is commonly pointed to as an extreme illustration of priestly rapacity and impoverishment of their charges, yet the clergy of Quebec outdo their prototypes across the ocean. The property of the church in France just before the Revolution amounted to four milliards of francs and the annual revenue to 200,000 000f., or $41,000,000. There was a population of 27,000,000 to support the burden by paying $1 50 apiece; while in Quebec it is borne by 1,000 000 persons, who are obliged to pay from $10 to $12 each. A comparison between the hierarchy in France and that in Quebec having been made in the article of revenue, we may add one made in point of numerousness. There were in France before the Revolution, according to Taine and Debos, 18 archbishops and 113 bishops; 28 religious communities, inhabiting 24,089 convents;

60,000 members of the regular clergy and 70,000 of the secular clergy. This gave 1 cleric to every 200 persons in the population of 27,000,000; but in Quebec there are 9,076 priests or others dependent on the church, which makes 1 for every 130 persons, or for every 26 families. Were the clergy of the United States in the same proportion to the laity as they are in Quebec, their number would be 480,619. "The burden," says a traveler, "is heavy on land that is too cold for the highest productivness." The same writer remarks that "the traveler down the St. Lawrence sees how the interests of religion are emphasized in the large churches raised in the midst of humble villages." This peculiarity was also remarked by Mr. Godkin, of the New York Post and Nation, in his trip: "The size and costliness of their churches are generally, judged by the American standard, amazingly out of proportion to the means and numbers of the worshipers. In New England one rarely finds, out of the large towns, churches of half the size, or costing half as much, as one is almost sure to meet with in the smallest Canadian village. We found in perhaps the poorest parish in the province, which for eight months of the year has no communication with the civilized world without a four days' journey through the wilderness, a lofty stone church, one hundred and fifty feet long by seventy broad, with a large vestry in the rear. The number of families which can reach it in winter, in fine weather, does not, we are assured, exceed three hundred." In Montreal, among a population notable for lack of wealth, there is now being built a cathedral one-third the size of St. Peter's.

The tithes being leviable on cereals, the farmers attempted to escape them by changing to the cultivation of peas, but the church wisely declared that peas was cereals. This was several years ago; a later proceeding of the same nature comes to us in a dispatch of October 19, 1890:

A change in the tithe system has been made by Mgr. Lafleche, bishop of the diocese of Three Rivers, in his letter read in all the churches of that diocese. The change, though apparently insignificant, means a revolution to the farmer. In the past the tithes were collected by the curés on grain only, the twenty-sixth bushel being given to the parish priest. There came a time when this contribution was deemed insufficient, and an ordinance was issued making it compulsory for all families not growing grain to pay $2 per year, and all other communicants not farmers, such as clerks, servants, etc., were required to pay $1 each per annum. The bishop says that both of these are now insufficient, and that the majority of the parish priests are unable to liv, owing to the fact that by far the largest area of the diocese has been given over to hay-growing, which was considered most profitable, and on which no tithes were paid. The bishop says that, from the present, all farmers and others raising hay within the limits of the diocese must pay to the curés seven and a half cents on every one hundred or $7 50 on every one thousand bundles of hay. This contribution will hav to be paid in money. It will hav to be paid in the time intervening between Ash Wednesday and Easter.

The bishop states that the faithful who do not pay this supplementary contribution will be guilty of larceny in keeping that which does not belong to them. This increased contribution, his lordship says, will enable the curés to liv as they should, and to exercise the charity which they must toward the church. The tithes heretofore existing were collectable by law, so that it is probable that an amendment will be asked to the civil code giving this extra contribution the force of law.

It is eminently characteristic of this Roman Catholic civilization that festivals in general are controled by the church, and made either religious or semi-religious in both their aims and their ceremonies. A crafty priest said to a traveler, with a shrewd smile, "Our people don't enjoy holidays unless the church assists them;" and his statement summarizes the national custom. The chief national civic festival, the Saint Jean Baptiste, is made semi-religious; the chief religious festival, the Fête-Dieu, or Corpus Christi, is made semi-civic; and the purely political holiday, Dominion Day, the 3d of July, set apart to celebrate the federation of the provinces and the foundation of the nation, receives no hearty support from the church or marked attention from her flock.

The schools of Quebec are conducted by nuns and friars, and impart scarcely anything beyond a knowledge of the catechism. "The public schools of Quebec province," says a report, "especially in the country, giving special attention to the interest the church regards as the highest, do little to remove the ignorance of the French peasant." One correspondent asserts that twelve in thirteen French Canadians cannot read or write. Be this estimate excessiv or not, it is certain that the proportion of illiteracy is very large.

The French Canadian peasant, or habitant, as he is often called, presents in the midst of the American continent to-day an exact duplication of the benighted denizen of medieval Europe. "The prayer-book," says Dr. Prosper Bender in the Magazine of American History, "constitutes the whole of his reading", in case that he is able to read. He pays no attention to government, and knows literally nothing of the outside world. He leaves to the priest of his village the conduct not only of ecclesiastical affairs but of those civil transactions that are everywhere else accounted quite without clerical purview. When pestilence or famin appear, he prays to saints, or perhaps clerics move about the vicinity in processions bearing holy insignia. The habitant combats the potato bug by sticking wooden crosses in his fields. He crosses himself before beginning or completing almost any act, and stops work three times a day to say a short prayer. Above his bed is a wooden cross painted black, below which is the sprig of blessed palm in a small bottle or vase, benitier, containing holy water, and close by is the religious calendar of the diocese. This twig of palm plays an important part in the religious ceremonies of the household, around it clustering beliefs of impressiv character. It is credited with the power of exorcising the evil one and preventing a stroke of lightning to the house. It is renewed each Palm Sunday, the old twig being carefully burnt. All houses are blessed by the curé about the time of their completion, while as soon as the walls are raised, a few bunches of palm, which they call le bouquet, are attached to the chimney or a gable, and a gun is fired by way of salute. The processions of the Host meet with the reverence and prostrations of centuries ago. The Host, most know, is a wafer made of wheaten flour and water; according to the Catholic church, prayers said over it at mass induce a miracle, by which the wafer is changed, "truly, really, and substantially," into the actual body of Christ. Wherever the procession bearing it passes, everyone falls on his knees and bows low; it seems as if some magic spell sweeps along the street and mows people down just where it finds them—in the house, on the walk, or in the mud. One visitor cannot repress his surprise at "seeing how this Catholic people mingle their religion with their daily duties and pleasures—at their frequent visits to the church, pilgrimages to shrines, the wearing of religious charms, the asking for blessings on their possessions and enterprises, their belief in miracles, their fear of a personal devil, their enlisting the saints to combat his witcheries." The artist and journalist C. H. Farnham, exploring these regions in the interest of Harper's Magazine, communicates to that periodical this amusing incident:

While conversing with the people I was in the habit of taking notes, as I had done elsewhere in my travels. But here this custom appeared to excite suspicion, so that I was often received with coldness and restraint. . . . The explanation was subsequently given me, partly by acquaintances who knew the people, and partly by knowledge of the people's history, traditions, and superstitions. . . . Many of them believe that any man who has their names or their portraits can command their persons through occult forces. Seeing me write often had thus given them very grave apprehensions. Then they generally believe in witchcraft, and one of the means for warding off spells is to place the thumb of each hand in the palm and close the fingers over it three times. My habit of coddling my thumbs may hav been taken as a sign of uncanny relations.

It is to be expected that the immorality which elsewhere invariably accompanies unhindered ecclesiastical rule, will likewise be found to attend the priestly régime of Quebec. At the time of this writing a daring curé of the parish of St. Henri, near Montreal, has just created a genuin sensation throughout the province by his exposure of the immorality of its people. The most casual observer, says this priest, cannot fail to be struck with the increasing immorality in the province of Quebec, much of which may be traced to the effects of early intemperance. In the city of Montreal alone there are over seven hundred licensed taverns, besides any number of unlicensed groggeries and gilded palaces of sin. In the French-Canadian country parishes, where the spirituous liquor most extensivly used is "whisky blanc," or high wines slightly reduced by water, drunkenness prevails to an alarming extent, even among young men still in their teens. An immense amount of villainously bad liquor, illicitly distilled in concealed shanties in the backwoods, is constantly upon the market. The last report of the minister of justice shows a startling increase in the census of the criminal classes, and the warden of the provincial penitentiary at St. Vincent de Paul reports that "the steady progression of crime observed for many years past has received no abatement during last year," and that "the total number of prisoners received in the penitentiary for the year 1889 was one hundred and thirty-four, showing an increase of twenty-six over the number received for the preceding year." The many lying-in hospitals and institutions for the reception of illegitimate children tell but a portion of the story. One maternity hospital in Montreal had between three hundred and four hundred patients last year, and the hospital of the Sacre Cœur at St. Sauveur, near Quebec, which is in charge of nuns, has recently had to be enlarged, though a large five-story institution. It is a home for foundlings, who are received nightly in a basket placed at the door, where those who bring them deposit them without fear of discovery, and leave them to the care of the Sisters, after ringing a bell to announce a new arrival. French oaths, that translated into English would not be tolerated in any decent society, are freely used by both men and women in the highest social circles of French Canada.

Montreal, though the capital of this province and the farthest removed from penury of all this priest-consumed country, is yet a city deficient beyond an American imagination in civil, social, and literary life. It is, says Mr. Farnham, "almost without social organization, lacking social leaders, amusements of worth, intellectual, scientific, and artistic centers and activities. . . . Intellectual interests," continues this describer, "are not a prominent interest in Montreal life. . . . Montreal is said to be the chief book center of Canada, . . . it is a center of Roman Catholic education, . . . but the city does not possess a public general library, excepting the Frazer Institute, just struggling into existence; the libraries of individual institutions do not cover well any other topics than theology and civil law. . . . The press of Montreal is very much hampered by the constant necessity of being politic in a sharply divided community. Music suffers from the disfavor with which the churches regard the drama; for without successful theaters or an opera an orchestra cannot be maintained, and the art thus lacks its chief means of expression." Montreal is, in short, concludes this writer, "the capital of a theocracy overgrowing a democracy." The city is full of gigantic monasteries. Indeed, the city was founded by building first of all a monastery big enough to contain the entire community; and to-day the same ratio holds, for the largest edifices of the city are convents. The chief obstruction to the city's growth is this ecclesiastic element. About twenty per cent of the property pays no taxes; many religious corporations manufacture various articles and make a ruinous competition with the working classes; and much of the land is locked up in religious orders that will neither sell nor improve it.

Such are some of the aspects of this dark province of Quebec, "said to be actually haunted by the devil and his spirits, and defended by God and his angels; with miracles of daily occurrence; the air full of legends and superstitions, as well as of religious zeal."

UN-AMERICAN DOCTRINS.

Notice is to be taken that the whole pretensions and spirit of the Roman Catholic church in Canada are more undisguisedly intolerant and more impudently presumptuous than in almost any other country. While in lands where ignorance and docility are less that church veils her foul designs and modifies her public expressions, in Canada she is not afraid to publish the extremest of her sentiments. It will be well for Americans to scrutinize such of her utterances as we giv following. That party in the church which aims to giv absolute power to the pope and take all its commands direct from Rome, called the Ultramontane party, has within the last half century obtained in Canada ascendency over the more moderate ecclesiastical wing. This Ultramontane movement is led in Canada by a society of fanatical propagandists called the "New School." This New School "approves everything the pope approves, and condemns everything that the pope condemns; consequently it rejects liberalism, philosophy, Cæsarism, rationalism, indifference." It is the glory of this school to follow in every particular the teaching of Rome, and to prove its sincerity by its acts. Bishop Bourget, the head of the New School, laid it down that "No one is permitted to be free in his religious and political opinions." Abbe Páquet, a professor in the University of Laval, Quebec, teaches that "man has neither the right nor the liberty to refuse to believe, or to choose between the different religions;" that "religious toleration is a gross error, a blasphemy, and an impiety;" that "everywhere and at all times the principle of religious or dogmatic intolerance will remain master of the position, because it is the truth, and truth is indestructible and eternal." A government, he says, cannot proclaim civil liberty of worship without usurping a right that does not belong to it. In perfect accord with this are the writings of Father Braün, a Jesuit priest of Montreal. "It is customary," he says, "to regard Protestantism as a religion which has its rights. This is an error. Protestantism is not a religion; Protestantism has not a single right. It possesses the force of seduction. It is a rebellion in triumph; it is an error which flatters human nature. Error can hav no rights; rebellion can hav no rights. Neither error nor rebellion can dispense with the obligation to perform a duty. Rebellion has a strict duty to fulfil; this duty is to repent, to come back; submission to the church."

The writers of this New School hav declared marriage performed by civil authorities alone to be void. "Some very serious practical results," says Charles Lindsey, "would follow application of this principle to the marriage relation. It would compel thousands of husbands to separate from their wives, and of wives from their husbands, while it would put the stigma of illegitimacy on the offspring. Civil marriage, the Jesuit Braün contends, is concubinage, the contract null, and the two parties, to whom the church refuses the sacraments, are bound to separate. . . . It may not be new to be told that it is 'the sovereign pontiff who declares what is the law of marriage, not only among the faithful, but also among heretics and Infidels,' and that 'he givs his decisions independent of local laws and temporal princes' (Braün, Mariage Chretien)."

"Ashamed of Being Called 'Infidel.'"

The above expression, as applied to the corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union, has been going the rounds of our Liberal papers of late. So long as it was the expression of people who are not members or who giv nothing whatever to support the society, it was unworthy of official notice. Recent letters from one or two members, however, indicate that the expression is finding credence among our own people. The secretary therefore thinks it incumbent on her to publicly define her position, not from personal motivs—as she long ago learned to liv above her neighbors' misapprehensions—but because the business welfare of the society demands it.

Those who know me best, know that I am never "ashamed" of letting any of my opinions, upon any subject whatever, be known. I was educated at a Quaker school, where the Quaker principle of "bearing testimony for the truth" permeated the entire moral atmosphere; and at this moment, I know of no motto which I would prefer for my inspiration to those splendid words of Lucretia Mott: "Let us hav truth for authority, not authority for truth."

But, while I am proud to call myself everywhere, and at all times, a Liberal and a Freethinker, I protest at all times and places against the term "Infidel." I protest because I consider it an incorrect term. Infidel and infidelity convey the idea of unfaithfulness, both etymologically and in the popular acceptation of the term. Where a Freethinker is sneered at for "infidelity," it is not so much his variance from the Christian or any other religion which his opponents think of when they utter the sneer, as it is the fear which they hav (an unbased fear, to be sure, but none the less real to them) that he is false to what nature and the consensus of civilized humanity, through long ages, hav made the established order of things. He seems to them like a retrograder to a looseness which the experience of mankind has shown to be undesirable, a betrayer of the evoluted faith of humanity (in a much larger sense than the narrow religious sense of "faith"); and so, in their fear and their ignorance, they hurl at him the epithet "infidel." This term is as much a misnomer of the true Liberal as "thief" or "liar" would be; and, to my way of thinking, it should be as indignantly repelled by any self-respecting man or woman.

I am aware that some who read these words will differ with me upon this matter. They will claim that "infidel" is a term of honor. It is quite conceivable that a man might in time so liv as to make even the epithets "liar" and "thief" terms of honor; but they would be none the less incorrect terms, if applied to an honest man. So, likewise, do I protest against the application of the word "infidel" to a Freethinker.

It is true that Webster's Dictionary givs, as a secondary definition of "Infidel," "one who disbelieves in Christ, or in the divine origin and authority of Christianity." I, however, dare to differ with that authority on this definition—although it is quite probable that, when Webster's Dictionary was first compiled, the definition may hav been a correct one. Evidently this definition is based on the presumption that the majority of Englishmen and Americans are professing Christians. Is this presumption correct? You know that it is not. You know very well that the majority of the people, both in England and in America, are either non-professors, or non-attenders (regularly) of church, or decided Liberals or else indifferent. Even Dr. Stevenson, the secretary of the party which is opposed to us, when talking to a church audience, and congratulating Christians on the triumph of Christ's cause, estimated only one in every five as a follower of Jesus! And yet he was turning the fair side to London when he made that estimate. With these and other statistics, how can the term "Infidel" correctly apply to a non-Christian even under Webster's definition? The faith of the majority of the people in England and America is to-day not Christian, whatever else it may or may not be. Consequently, it is incorrect to call a Freethinker "an Infidel," even under this secondary definition by Webster.

But even stripped of its offensiv meaning of falseness to humanity, and confined to the narrower meaning of falseness to the Christian creed, "Infidel" applies to few, if any, save Christians themselvs. For who hav departed from the precepts of the founder of Christianity, if not Christians? Who are laying up riches on earth, and insisting on oaths in courts of justice, and resisting those who try to rob them (or who merely, in cases of labor oppression, try to get back their own), if not Christians? Curiously enough, it is upon the Freethinker to-day that the duty has devolved of emphasizing some of these very precepts, such as, for instance, "Swear not at all; but let your communication be yea, yea; nay, nay." And thus, my friends, I hold that, even under the least offensiv definition possible, "Infidel" applies more particularly to church people than to any others; so that, if only for this reason alone, it should be resented when applied to a Freethinker.

In conclusion, I beg to quote part of a letter which I lately wrote to one of our members on this matter:

My objections to the term are based entirely on its etymology, its dictionary meanings, and its popularly accepted signification; and not at all on any fear that I hav of my opinions on religious matters being generally known. I am only too glad, at all times, to hav an opportunity of "bearing testimony," as the Quakers phrase it. It is true that I prefer to bear that testimony in my own way. In meeting strangers, I do not care to blurt out my Freethought views at first—not because I am afraid, but because I can do better for the cause by having a little patience, and gradually surrounding the individual whom I want to conquer with breastwork after breastwork of argument, and then suddenly and swiftly bearing down upon him from all quarters, so that he has to cry for mercy. When I fight for Freethought, I fight to win; and I must be allowed to fight in my own way. A coward I am not, and never hav been. As to martyrdom, I think it very foolish to seek an opportunity for that; but, when it is inevitable, I hav always borne it without flinching.

IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Progress of the Cause in Washington.

There is good reason for congratulations on the results of the work done by the Washington Secular Union.

It will be remembered that the barbers of Seattle, under the subtle scheming of Rev. W(ily) Crafts, of the American Sunday Union, applied to the common council for an ordinance to compel closing of all barber shops on Sunday. Defeated in this by the Washington Secular Union, they next endeavored to hav the old territorial law enforced, and made several arrests; defeated again, they rearrested one of our members and took him before the superior court, and the Washington Secular Union scored another victory.

The fanatics next arrested the principal clothing merchants, had trial; jury promptly acquitted. Sunday fanatics were discouraged.

The following editorial notices, gleaned from to-day's Seattle newspapers, tell the story:

The barbers hav united in their efforts to decrease the hours of labor, and hereafter all the shops will close at noon on Sundays.—Press Times, April 4.

With bat and ball.—Exhibition game, April 12 —Arrangements hav been made for an exhibition game between the Amateur league team and the Seattle professionals, on Sunday, April 12th, one week from to-morrow.—Press Times, April 4.

John Cort's Casino.—Where to spend a quiet Sunday afternoon with pleasure. This new and thoroughly equipped place of amusement, under the management of Mr. John Cort, the enterprising young theatrical man, will no doubt continue to be crowded with pleased, enthusiastic audiences. Take the Yesler avenue car to-morrow at 2 o'clock, and don't get off until you hav reached the pavilion.—Press Times, April 4.

To-day the Sunday Closing Association paid in $68.56 as costs in the four suits that they brought against saloon men, and then had dismissed, owing to failure to convict in the first case tried. The date of hearing in the appealed Bowers case has not been set. Prosecuting Attorney Snell says the association is now playing the baby act in trying to saddle the costs in the Bowers case on the county. He says the association ageeed before the suit was commenced that the county would not be asked to pay costs if the prosecution failed. He also added that he did not think the association would be successful in making the public pay for the association whistle.—Seattle Telegraph, April 2.

At a private meeting of the ministers and those who are working up the anti-Sunday saloon agitation, it was decided to appeal to the Bowers case, recently thrown out of court, and hav the other four complaints withdrawn. This is done to save the risk of costs, as decided against them in the Bowers case. They hav had an ordinance drawn, which they hope to hav passed, which is a duplicate of the state Sunday law, and which will make the city the prosecutor.—Seattle Telegraph.

There is no question but the territorial law is unconstitutional, hence it was not to our interest to make effort to help the passage of the Owens Sunday law: that would exempt all within city limits, and enforce the law on all outside corporate limits.

The power to annoy by causing arrest is still in the hands of the fanatics, and will continue to be until a case is decided by the supreme court; but as we beat them on every case in the lower courts, there is little chance of obtaining a supreme court decision. Hence the need of educating the people on the facts, biblical, historical, and legal, in regard to Sunday laws and Sabbath observance. The manuscript of the pamphlet ordered by the convention is in the hands of the printers. An edition of five thousand copies will be gratuitously but very carefully distributed throughout the state by the vice-presidents of our organization.

I make no claim to any original ideas, but the facts are concisely stated and presented in startling array; the pamphlet is written in such a spirit of frankness that even the most rabid Sunday devotee will be constrained to admit the facts and be forced to serious consideration of the subject.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The following extract from a letter just received givs evidence that the good work is progressing:

TEANAWAY, WASH., April 2, 1891.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Secretary Washington Secular Union, Freemont, Wash., Dear Friend: Your very valued communication received and read to our society. We are moving on very harmoniously and progressing nicely. Everything points to success for the future of the Kittitas Secular Union.

I am instructed to report to you that we hav stopped the reading of the Bible and religious exercises in our public schools here.

I inclose herewith a copy of our constitution and by-laws just received from the printers. Our members express themselvs as very grateful for all your kindness.

Yours in friendship, G. W. SEATON,
Vice-President Wash. Secular Union.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

The passage of the amended assessment law, and at the last moment ringing in the exemption of church property clause, afforded no opportunity, as in California, for any protest. It was publicly given out that the churches, in view of the very heavy expenses incurred and the high rate of taxation in consequence, would seek in vain for any modification of the law of last session. Then in the very last days of the session the clause copied from the old territorial law was smuggled into the assessment act and rushed through.

An extra session is likely to be called. Should it be, every possible effort will be made to enforce the righting of the mean, treacherous wrong perpetrated by those conservators of morality, the priests and parsons.

Would that the Liberals were prepared to test the constitutionality of the exemption act in the supreme court.

It is impossible to reconcile the exemption of church property with the "declaration of rights" of our state constitution:

"No public money or property shall be appropriated for, or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment." C. B. REYNOLDS,
Secretary Washington Secular Union.
Freemont, Wash.

The Kansas People's Party.

[We voted the People's party ticket last fall and subscribed for the Salina Union, which is the Salina county Alliance organ. I don't know how the Liberals of the county can keep their mouths shut any longer. Here we hav had the party platform published week after week, and nothing said about it all winter long. Not long since I wrote a few lines and sent them to the office of the Union, but the exreverend immaculate senior editor of this scarcely feathered-out national reform paper very tenderly returned my manuscript with the highly edifying remark that he and I did not agree or believe alike in regard to the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. I suppose he will be quite likely to disfranchise all of the Infidels, and in fact all others with whom he differs, as soon as he becomes powerful enough to do so. I send you the rejected manuscript, which you may dispose of as you like.—NEWTON MITCHELL.]

The simple declaration, "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," has survived the tempest of political strife for more than a century, and I cannot believe that the American people will ever voluntarily surrender this most vital of all principles pertaining to free government. The founders of the republic placed the source of government within the reach of humanity.

"God is the rightful sovereign of nations, from whom all just powers of government are derived, and to whom all human enactments ought to conform." Such is the declaration of our new party of Kansas, and in the estimation of many good people such high-sounding words display great political wisdom; but there are many others who most decidedly and seriously object to the introduction of such a principle into our form of government. If the majority of our people favor the above sentiment, I would mildly suggest that we kill the American eagle and supply his lofty perch with a goose.

The remainder of the platform relates only to matters which may be investigated and understood by ordinary mortals, and the St. Louis platform is free from that ancient style of politics, for which we are truly thankful.

We hav no use for the hidden mysteries, no use for the incomprehensible or the unknowable in connection with our platform; what we need can only be determined by mortal experience and human reason.

Had the Farmers' national convention recommended any such fossiliferous fragments of dogmatic theology for political use, it might justly hav been denounced as an act of folly. Why did the People's party take this decided stand for the union of church and state? If they were sincere (which is doubtful), it displays only fanatical imbecility; if not, so much the worse, for we can ill afford to see this mighty uprising of a great and honest people shrouded in the mantle of political dishonesty and idiotic hypocrisy. AGNOSTIC.

Prohibition.

It is utterly wrong under the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

Prohibition, as it is now being agitated in the United States, means the enactment of laws forbidding the manufacture and sale, and thus, indirectly, the use, of spirituous beverages, as wine, beer, whisky, and so forth.

Properly speaking, the United States is the only civilized country of the globe where such prohibitory laws exist, in some of the states, and where their enactment, in other states, is advocated by certain parties. The highly civilized nations of Europe do not know anything of Prohibition, with the exception of the Turks, who by the Koran, their religious book, are taught to abstain from the use of spirituous beverages. Yet, among them the abomination of polygamy prevails as a legal institution. The Bible, on the other hand, rather encourages the use of wine. Beer and whisky were plainly not yet invented when the scriptures were written.

The beverages named are products of civilization, having been invented, and being manufactured and used, by civilized nations. The preparation of certain kinds of the same is attended to with great care by these nations, and has reached a high degree of perfection. It is a well-known fact that in the Old World the nations using these beverages are intellectually brighter and rank higher in their achievements as to civilization than the nations do that are not using them.

Prohibition absolutely violates both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. The former recognizes the natural, inherent, and inalienable rights of man, eating and drinking included, and says that all men are created equal, that is, that they are entitled to equal treatment under the law. A man, therefore, in this country, may drink what he pleases—cold, fresh water (being the cheapest and healthiest of beverages), or wine, beer, hard cider, and so forth, provided he pays for the latter beverages, if he has not produced them himself. Then, the Constitution is to secure the blessings of liberty, personal and industrial liberty included, to the American people. A man, therefore, in the United States, may use the gifts of nature for his own benefit or for that of others, as he sees fit and chooses, also for the manufacture and sale of spirituous beverages.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided prohibitory legislation in any state of the Union to be lawful under the American Constitution. Yet, its decisions in this respect are at variance with both common sense and the fundamental principles of this free country. This tribunal is not infallible, although its decisions become the law of the land.

In one of its decisions the Supreme Court says that no man has a natural right to sell spirituous beverages by the glass. Why not? They are, exactly like tea, milk, coffee, chocolate, and similar beverages, nothing but liquid food. No discrimination, therefore, can lawfully be made, under the fundamental charters named of our American freedom, as to the sale of spirituous beverages. Another argument used by the Supreme Court, in its decisions referred to, reads, that, under the Constitution of the United States, every state of the Union has the right to adopt police regulations, and that prohibitory laws are nothing but such regulations.

In answer to this argument, it may be said, that in a free country police regulations can be directed only against nuisances—things that annoy and giv trouble and vexation—either to prevent or to abate them. Yet, it can not be proved that the manufacture and sale of spirituous beverages are nuisances. As to their manufacture, they are made of the best fruits, grains, and of other useful products of the soil of this country, and their sale simply consists of transactions of trade. While prohibitory laws, where they exist in the Union, are worded thus, that they forbid only the manufacture and sale of spirituous beverages, their real aim is plainly to prevent the consumption of such beverages. Yet it cannot be justly said, that a man, by decently and sensibly drinking spirituous beverages, which he has produced himself, or for which he pays, and which benefit him, commits a nuisance by thus offending his neighbor, who, believing in total abstinence from these beverages, is using only non-spirituous drinks. Thus it will be seen that neither the manufacture nor the sale, or the use of spirituous beverages, is a nuisance.

These beverages are frequently called intoxicants. Every one of them, it is true, because it contains alcohol, is intoxicating, if used to excess. But none of them is so by itself, if properly used. They all contain more or less water, which, as a matter of course, is not intoxicating. It has also never been proved that spirituous beverages decently and sensibly used, and if of good and pure quality, are injurious to the health of man or poisonous. On the contrary, the men using them as liquid food, in a proper manner, say that they are physically benefited, by being refreshed by them.

The advocates of Prohibition say that the use of spirituous beverages frequently leads to crime. It is true that a good many murders are committed in this country by intoxicated men. Yet, is the circumstance that they carry concealed weapons—a fact necessarily implying a murderous intent—not the real cause, and their intoxication only the occasion of their murderous deeds?

Drunkenness, a vice and a shame, can never be made a lawful excuse for any crime or misdemeanor. On the contrary, a man should always be as severely punished for any wrong or violation of the law committed by him while drunk as if he had been perfectly sober. Otherwise, if criminally inclined, he would only hav to become drunk to commit his crime with impunity!

Drunkenness may be considered as a short insanity. Yet it is exclusivly caused by the drunken man's own fault, and has not the characteristics of insanity caused by disease, physical defects, or misfortune. The law does not hold a man suffering from insanity of the latter kind responsible if he commits a crime.

An excessiv use of spirituous beverages in the United States—which is by no means the rule but only the exception, and always to be deplored—can be effectivly prevented only by the advancement of social education among the American people. Legal Prohibition in this country, in any form or shape, by a constitutional provision or amendment, or by a statutory law, or by local option—which is nothing but localized Prohibition—is plainly a social and political untruth, having moral slavery for its object. No man can be made virtuous by law. This can be accomplished only by self-respect. Self-respect, therefore, not prohibitory laws, ought to dictate every man in the United States his course as to the use of spirituous beverages. Total abstinence is, as a matter of course, a good and praiseworthy thing for a man if he feels unable to control himself as to the use of such beverages, or if they do not agree with him, or if he cannot afford to pay for them. Common sense, nothing else, will permanently render the American people a sober nation.

Prohibition, according to the foregoing discussion, is unworthy of the free men of this free country, and should, as soon as possible, be buried forever in the United States. J. G. HERTWIG.

Washington, D. C.

The Badge.

I hav been much interested in the pansy and torch discussion. I like the idea of a cheap floral emblem, one that we can stamp all our stationery with. The world is growing more and more cosmopolitan. We cannot all be leaders, and why then object to the pansy because other countries adopted it first? The old is not always best, but the stamp of age has its value. The pansy is a universal favorit, and its motto a good one.

Can we not combine the torch and pansy in some pretty design for our stationery, and get rubber stamps made, and so hav a print that will be suggestiv, handsome, and effectiv? The new emblem need not supersede or injure the others, only supplement them.

I hav never seen Wettstein's badge, but I hav Miss Churchill's, as I aided her in getting her first ones out of the express office where they were held for payment.

I am glad Mr. Wettstein explained about the patent. I hav always felt a little hard toward him for superseding her pin and giving her no recompense. We often misjudge people from not knowing all the circumstances.

Yours for the best, and for harmony and unselfish Liberalism. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Snowville, Va.

Hav we not had quantum sufficit of flowery speeches over the badge-pin topic? Others may like it, but it seems a waste of valuable time and space when three columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are taken up in a quibbling over the choice of a badge for Liberals. First catch your Liberals! I agree in toto with what Miss Wixon says about it. Mr. Wettstein's badge-pin tells what is meant, the same as Mr. Heston's cartoons divulge thought. Hence we hav not only thought, but reason, science, and liberty, contrasted with superstition, persecution, and murder, as the true history of past ages givs us.

But we liv in the practical. What are we doing for our present martyrs for freedom of speech? With E. H. Heywood, a brave worker for religious liberty, serving two years in the penitentiary; Moses Harman sentenced to one year for offending "good taste" in behalf of woman's marital freedom; J. W. Caldwell's case not yet decided, and the "lost ground" cases spoken of in a late TRUTH SEEKER, there is need of more work and less words. Surely the Washington Secular Union is taking the lead, and, I think, it has no pansy badge, either.

I hav been reading D. M. Bennett's book, "Champions of the Church," and I confess I "don't love 'em a little bit." Read it carefully, my beloved Christian friends. And do not fail to read "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" true to life and twice as interesting. Success be yours! FLORA W. FOX.

Sunday Question.

In Exodus the Jews are commanded to "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." In Leviticus xxiii, seven verses are devoted to commanding observance of the 10th day of every seventh month. The most awful penalties are threatened against whoever violates it by labor—"that soul will I cut off—ye shall do no manner of work, and it shall be a statute forever among all your generations, in all your dwellings."

How is it that no attention is paid by our "unco guid" to this last, while they would obey the first by even changing the day from Saturn's day to the Sun's day? HOLT.

Too Close a Union Now of Church and State.

From the World.

An extraordinary bill is pending in the legislature, or rather it would be extraordinary were it not for existing legislation concerning religious corporations. Whether or not it has been the intention of the authors of this measure to conceal its purpose, and even its existence, we do not know; but thus far it has escaped the notice of those who are most interested in it.

If its provisions should become law the state will hav made a definit alliance with every church not only in respect to its temporal affairs but in respect to its spiritual affairs as well, and this is directly contrary to the spirit and intention of our institutions, which decree the divorce of church and state.

Naturally the state must hav relations with religious corporations, because they hav a moneyed side and hold property in trust; but beyond that the state has no duty whatever to perform. The bill in question determins the method of choosing vestrymen, wardens, trustees, or by whatever name the governing body of a church is called. It makes rules for their meetings, and regulates the appointment and dismissal of ministers. In this connection the canons of the Episcopal church are made part of the statute law of the state, so that the bishops may call upon the secular power for aid in the enforcement of their spiritual powers.

All this is wrong. It is against the genius of our country. It involves the state with the churches. It makes it a necessary part in theological controversies. The people of the churches ought to make the rules for their government, not the politicians at Albany.

It is evident that some one is behind this bill who wants a little more power than his own church is willing to accord him, and who would like the assistance of the state in religious matters.

There is no doubt that the laws of New York respecting religious corporations need amendment, but in the other direction. They already bring the state into too close connection with the church. The statute providing for the incorporation of such societies should be no longer or more specific than that which provides for the incorporation of clubs, and it should be confined to the business or temporal side of the subject.

dated September 22, 1875, claims for the clergy nothing less than the absolute direction of political elections. It is also assumed therein that the church is independent of civil society and superior to it; that "the state is in the church, and not the church in the state." The priests, who are assumed to belong to a society superior to civil society, are also empowered to giv supreme directions to the constituted authorities. Should anyone deny the right of the priest to interfere in elections with spiritual censures, Bishop Bourget says, on his own account, he ought not to be elected. Nor are the electors to regard as eligible any candidate "who desires the separation of church and state; who sustains propositions condemned by the syllabus; who rejects the intervention of the pope, the bishops, and the priests in the affairs of government;" who "criticises and censures the mandates and circulars of bishops and the instructions of pastors on the subject of elections;" who "favors journals, books, and societies which the church condemns." Bishop Rogers of New Brunswick goes as far as any of the Quebec bishops. He lays it down that the law of God, which is to be the rule in politics as in everything else, is to be interpreted for Roman Catholics by their legitimate pastors, especially the pope, the first pastor, the authorized interpreter of the law of God not only in matters of faith but also of morals, which comprehend every human act. Even Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto, who has aimed to play a liberal rôle, defines politics to be morals on a large scale; and we know that the church claims absolute direction in all matters of morals. The bishop of Rimouski, apart from the joint letter, in 1875 claimed the right of the priests to interfere in elections with the terrors of spiritual censures, and denied the right of the civil authority to put any limits to the ecclesiastical power. He warned the faithful not to vote for anyone who sustains principles which the church has condemned. Notwithstanding that it is made penal by civil law, the priests habitually command their parishioners to vote in a certain way under pain of future punishment. The simple peasants, believing fully that the priests can send them to hell, vote as they dictate.

THE OUTLOOK FOR ANNEXATION.

Canada has an extensiv sea-coast, indented with many bays and harbors, affording admirable facilities for maritim enterprise. To these will soon be added, no doubt, the island of Newfoundland, which possesses fisheries unequaled either in the Old or in the New World. The value of Canadian forests is yearly becoming more evident. The great plains of the Northwest Territory contain land of almost inexhaustible fertility. These and other material advantages must soon attract the desires and schemes of more than one American syndicate. The past and present conduct of our Congress does not leave ground for expectation that these syndicates would seek in vain to procure from our government a declaration of claim to Canada. This, of course, in the event that their commercial interests would be forwarded by annexation, which they probably would. Or, in the event of war between Russia and England, the landing of troops by the former on the province of her enemy would very probably be followed by an appropriation of that country by the United States, and expulsion of Russians and British as well. Again, it has been rumored that the Roman Catholic church will enter upon machinations to procure annexation both of Canada and of Mexico, that she may elect a president from her ranks. In more ways than we may now pause to conjecture the northern territories of this continent may come to us. We must take possession of them, says General Butler, "sooner or later, peaceably if possible, forcibly if we must." No opinion for or against annexation is to be understood as given in this article. Our object is solely to call the attention of Freethinkers to the religious troubles that can scarcely fail to follow, and entreat them to prepare against those troubles by endeavoring to add to that number of Freethinkers in the United States in whom rests the hope of the future.

"THE NEXT WAR FROM THE NORTH."

Let us consider more at large the possible effects of annexation upon the relations of religion and the state in our nation.

Certainly the proportion of Roman Catholics in our citizens will be largely augmented. It is an unpleasing fact that the French Canadians, who are nearly all of that denomination, are so extraordinarily prolific that their present rate of multiplication will before long enable them to predominate over large portions of this continent. If they keep their present faith, it can scarcely be otherwise than that they will become an element of the greatest power for evil. They hav already overspread large sections of Canada that were English and Protestant. Throughout the eastern edge of Ontario, which strip they are overrunning, they hav extensivly converted the English-speaking schools into French clerical schools. The ecclesiastics advance to their parishioners money at low interest to buy out the property of the Englishmen, because the land in Catholic hands will pay tithes. The tax assessors aid by raising the taxes on property under British ownership. The church urges the scriptural command to increase and multiply on the earth. The habitants marry very young, and in a dozen years hav bred as many children. Families of twenty or twenty-five are not at all uncommon. Another method by which French extension is effected is reported thus: "Wherever Canadians intermarry with the English or Scotch, the Canadians, owing to their greater religious tenacity, almost invariably succeed in bringing up the children as Catholics; and the children being Catholics, they naturally consort with the French, and are soon absorbed by them." "Protestantism and the British element in Quebec," says Professor Smith, "are now almost at their last gasp. They are fast being shouldered out of every part of the province except the English quarter of Montreal. Even there, their commerce is being attacked by the plundering hostility of the French Catholic legislature, just as the commerce of Belfast would be by an Irish Catholic legislature in Ireland. Nor is the advancing tide of aggression confined to Quebec. Eastern Ontario is being rapidly overflowed." These spreading Canadian Catholics hav already overflowed into New England in legions, and with the Irish Catholics of the south hav changed many parts of that region to Roman Catholic hot-beds.

It is not simply in numbers but in intensity of churchism that the population of Quebec presents a most threatening aspect. The clergy of that province are inflexibly set upon a hierarchical rule over all civil authorities, and the people are as immovably devoted to the procurement of this ecclesiastical rule for their spiritual fathers. As illustrativ of the assumption of civil authority by the clergy, the following instances may be given. At the opening of Parliament on Jan. 11, 1889, Cardinal Taschereau and his clergy were assigned seats on the floor. The cardinal instantly expressed the greatest indignation and demanded a seat on the throne, claiming precedence over the lieutenant-governor, the queen's representativ. Speaker Bruére and Premier Mercier hastily sent an apology to his eminence, and a throne was erected beside the queen's throne and exactly under the royal arms. Cardinal Taschereau and his train of prelates occupied this when Parliament opened, amid murmurs of Protestant members. Again, at the visit of Prince George of Great Britain in the autumn of 1890 the cardinal demanded precedence at the reception given that prince, and failing to obtain it refused to attend. The act of Parliament by which the Jesuits were awarded $400,000 for claims which were properly long outlawed by lapse of time, was in itself a shameful thing; but the point that we wish to note here is that it was made conditional on the concurrence of the pope. Thus a foreign potentate was admitted to participation in the legislatorial authority of the Dominion of Canada. For helping to carry through this legislation, Premier Mercier, the representativ of the queen through the whole Dominion, received from the Vatican the decoration of a knightly order of the church. There are statutes on the books having marginal references such as, "Decree by our holy father, the pope, to take precedence," etc. It is to be marked that these proceedings took place not in the provincial parliament of Quebec, but in the federal parliament of the Dominion of Canada; and that these statutes are not those of the province but of the Dominion. By zealousness of religious faith the Catholic representativs in parliament are solidified into a body that invariably obtains the balance of power. Quebec—which is to say, the hierarchy—virtually rules the Dominion. Under wily ecclesiastical guidance the French hav got the better of the English in every contention or intrigue.

Many other examples of assumption by the church of superiority to civil institutions, are reported to this country; sometimes nuns claim exemption from judicial citation to court as witnesses, sometimes bargains are asserted invalid because of lack of ecclesiastical concurrence, and sometimes marriages of backsliding priests are pronounced null and void and the repentant priest reinstated in orders while the wife and children are abandoned to the world. "The aim of Rome," writes the Episcopal bishop Usher, "is to make her church the state church of the Dominion." A dispatch lately received from Kingston, Ont., contains passages from an address by Archbishop Cleary as follows: "Poor little wretched ministers!" he cries of his opponents; "the right to control the education of youth will never be surrendered to any men; to premier, to governor-general, to queen, to anyone. Never! Never! No surrender!" Respecting the agitation to discontinue Catholic separate schools in Ontario, he exclaims: "Separate schools are in the constitution! And the constitution must go, the confederation must go, the Dominion of Canada must go, before we will giv up separate schools!"

The turn of the contest now going on in Manitoba over the schools is illustrativ. After a desperate struggle the Protestants succeeded in getting through the legislature of that province an act abolishing the separate schools devoted to the French language and the Roman Catholic religion. But these separate schools are still in full operation; not one has been closed. The church, boasted Archbishop Cleary in the address noted above, simply sent out instructions to the people not to pay any attention to the new law, and they didn't.

The hostility between the two great sects in Canada is inappeasable. It has kept the two elements in a perpetual conflict for years. Violence is incessant. Street brawls and riots and midnight assassinations are occurrences of nearly every day. Throughout 1890 the outbreak of a set war was continually expected. In March, 1890, there was exceptionally fierce contention between the Protestant and Orange city of Ottawa and the Roman Catholic city of Hull—population twenty thousand—situated opposit on the Ottawa river. Premier Mercier was compelled to dispatch a corps of detectivs and one hundred police; and the 43d regiment Carleton Rifles, with a detachment of dragoon guards, were got ready. Orange parades in Montreal hav met with such handling that they hav been discontinued for several years; but it is intended to hold one next July, and the Catholics promis the paraders bloody usage. Writes C. H. Farnham: "The outlook for peace [in Montreal] is well-nigh hopeless, with two systems of education producing fundamental differences of character, and nourishing religious intolerance, race antipathy, social division, political antagonism, and commercial separation." "It will be difficult indeed," says another writer, "to form a homogeneous people on this half of North America under circumstances and conditions such as the present." The Catholics of Montreal not long ago requested of the city council a site in the center of Mount Royal park on which to erect a colossal statue of the Virgin Mary, nearly as large as that of Liberty in New York harbor. The Protestants counter-petitioned, and declared that they would blow up the statue some dark night. Retaliation was threatened on the statues of Nelson and Queen Victoria, which are displeasing to the French and the Irish population respectivly. "I say to the Protestants," exhorts Bishop Usher, "put forth your power to prevent war—civil war—or come it will!" In the memories of us all there still dwell the ominous words of General Grant: "If we are to hav another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other." Is it possible that the fulfillment of Grant's prophecy may come upon us through the opening indicated in the following lines of Professor Goldwin Smith?—"I hav told public men that if they did not take care, trouble, as it had come to them from the south, would some day come to them from the north. The South Carolina of a second irrepressible conflict is not unlikely to be found in French Canada, dominated by the Jesuit."

Let us hope that a century hence will not find on the continent of North America a half-score of embittered and contending nations, unhappy disrupted members of a once great Union; some perhaps struggling toward the light, some uninformed and erring, and others wielded by the dark powers of ecclesiasticism in designs of subjugation and degradation against the whole. Rather let us hope for victory of the principles of good—for the illumination of the dark places, the freeing of the minds enthralled, the gentilizing of the savage, the undeceiving of the beguiled, the carrying of the banner of civil and religious liberty in jubilation and hope over all the ramparts of ignorance and ill. In the achievement of this mighty end, there is demand for every Freethinker's devotion and effort.

Mediumistic Phenomena.

The question now before THE TRUTH SEEKER meeting-house seems to be, How are the demonstrations of the Spiritual mediums to be accounted for?

It is getting to be a pretty well-established fact, I believe, that they are not all the result of legerdemain or deception, and that there are some phenomena that cannot be attributed to hypnotism or any other known law or force.

For one I would be glad to be able to believe that disembodied spirits hav something to do with them, but I confess with genuin sorrow and disappointment that in my thirty-five years of investigation I hav never had a single solitary proof of spirit existence. If ever a poor mortal wanted to believe in the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism I did.

When "physical medium" Allen and wife, now at Summerland, Cal., were on their way West, they stopped off one night in this city and gave us a séance at the residence of Mrs. Christina Mailey, 607 Shawnee street. Her sitting-room was prepared for the occasion by taking up the carpet and darkening the windows. Sixteen chairs were placed in a circle, one for each person in the room, inside of which stood a table about two feet in front of the medium.

On the table was a pad of writing paper, several short pencils, a lamp, a guitar, and a bell. About two feet behind the medium, outside the circle, stood two chairs, side by side, on one of which rested a dulcimer, with the sticks lying on the instrument. The doors were bolted, the occupants of the chairs clasped hands all around, and the light was blown out. The chairs were wedged together so that the persons of the guests were in close contact. On the right of the medium sat Mrs. Gillan, an old citizen, firmly grasping his right hand, and on his left I sat part of the time stoutly clenching his left hand. The stillness of death pervaded the room; the drop of a pin could hav been heard all over it. The slightest move of foot, limb, or body, and every long breath even, could be distinctly heard by all. We were all intent upon watching the medium and his wife, and our perceptiv faculties were intensified to a high degree. Within two minutes after the light was extinguished the medium began to twitch, and remarked that there was an unusual force of magnetism present and that we would not hav long to wait for developments.

A moment later a low, sweet, weird-like music began upon the dulcimer, gradually increasing in volume, until finally reaching the full capacity of the instrument. As many as forty or fifty tunes, I should think, were played during the evening, often accompanied by guitar and bell in the air over our heads, producing as well-timed and as fine concert music as could hav been executed by professional musicians.

Interspersed was quite a variety of other phenomena, but I will only refer to a few. Occasionally we had a display of fire-works over our heads. Balls of soft, pearly light, about the size of small marbles, would appear, and move laterally a little downward, disappearing eight or ten inches from the point of appearance.

Those taking turns sitting on the left hand of the medium would be manipulated by so-called spirit-hands, patted, sometimes light, sometimes hard, on head, face, or shoulders—beard stroked again and again—articles taken from pockets, and hair-pins from hair, and flung against the wall—the scratching of writing plainly heard on the table, and the letter when finished torn from the pad with a loud swish and whisped through the air to the pocket of the person on the medium's left.

All phenomena took place within two or three feet of the medium. The guitar and bell did not "float about the room," as we are apt to express it, but appeared to vibrate or gyrate about within two or three feet of the medium's head. When the entertainment was over and the lamp lighted, the two chairs were found piled one on top of the other on the table and the dulcimer on top of all.

Hypnotism could hav had no hand or agency in the production of these phenomena. That force does not act uniformly on all persons; but all in this circle heard, saw, and felt precisely alike. Hypnotized persons are practically asleep and oblivious to everything really taking place while in that condition; but we were all wide awake and intensely conscious of everything coming within range of our five senses. How can hypnotism account for the so-called spirit-letters written and put into our pockets or bosoms, the hair taken down, the hair-pins and pocket-books thrown against the wall and afterward picked up on the floor, and for the chairs and dulcimer lifted over our head and piled up on the table? These were veritable realities, far beyond the ideal realities of hypnotism.

The contents of the letters failed to furnish me any proof that they were inspired by departed friends, and nothing in the entire evening's program had the effect to convince me of the presence of disembodied spirits. If a disembodied spirit can pick up a pencil and write, I see no good reason why a spirit still dwelling here in the body may not do the same. If we are spirits, if we possess spiritual bodies, why may not the mind or will direct our spirit-hands to write or to play tunes upon a musical instrument?

Now, I may be wrong, but the facts connected with that evening's manifestations forced this conviction upon my mind: that our circle constituted a battery which generated a sufficient force, call it magnetism, or whatsoever name you will, to perform those acts, directed of course by the intelligence and will of the medium. We acted as an engin—the medium acted simply as an engineer or operator.

Why attribute an effect to some foreign, far-away cause, of whose very existence even we hav no proof, when a present and known cause is, to say the least, equally adequate? Until the contrary is proved it is safe to rest upon the proposition that spirits in the body are quite as powerful as spirits out of the body. Particularly, when it is remembered how helplessly dependent disembodied spirits are upon their earthly friends for assistance in performing their tricks. If heavenly spirits can utilize a magnetic current after it is already prepared for them by earth spirits, what is to prevent earthly will and intelligence from doing the same? Is it not a rule of logic as well as a law of science, reason, and common sense to attribute an effect to the nearest sufficient cause?

The possibility of these phenomena having been caused by a confederate is even more remote than that of disembodied spirits. If a confederate got into the room he either crawled through the keyhole, came down the chimney, removing the flue-stopper, or was concealed in Mr. Allen's pockets or in the folds of Mrs. Allen's skirts.

Mr. Allen and wife were both chained fast in the circle. The only thing they could possibly do without our knowledge was to wink. We held them firmly as in a vice. While manifestations were in progress Mr. Allen appeared as if in the throes of hard labor—convulsiv contraction and twitching of muscles and cords, and two or three times the spasmodic clutching of his right hand was so pronounced that Mrs. Gillan cried out with pain and declared that if he did not desist she would take another seat in the circle. He would frequently sigh deep and heavy as though suffering exhaustion of vital energy.

Mr. Allen, very likely, honestly believes that he is coöperating with, and directing and controling, disembodied spirits. When he directs the "spirits" to play a certain tune upon the dulcimer, he unconsciously accompanies it, and may little dream that he is the real performer. I recollect that, in my younger days, I played some tunes on the violin so much that the execution of them seemed to be something separate and apart from myself. The tunes appeared to play themselvs while I looked on as a spectator—much the same as the leg will vibrate, in spite of all efforts of the will to stop it, when balanced in a certain position on the toes.

Séances of this character are valuable contributions to scientific research. This was by far the most wonderful and interesting display of power over the occult forces, or higher laws of nature, that I ever witnessed, and the committee of investigation recently appointed could do no better than to hunt up Mr. Allen and study his marvelous powers.

On Wagner's Music.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's Address at the Stanton-Seidl Liederkranz Banquet.

It is probable that I was selected to speak about music because, not knowing one note from another, I hav no prejudice on the subject. All I can say is that I know what I like—and, to tell the truth, I like every kind, enjoy it all, from the hand-organ to the orchestra. Knowing nothing of the science of music, I am not always looking for defects, or listening for discords. As the young robin cheerfully swallows what comes, I hear with gladness all that is played.

Music has been, I suppose, a gradual growth, subject to the law of evolution—and nearly everything, with the possible exception of theology, is under this law.

Music may be divided into three kinds: First, the music of simple time, without any particular emphasis—and this may be called the music of the heels; second, music in which time is varied, in which there is the eager haste and the delicious delay, that is, the fast and slow, in accordance with our feelings, with our emotions—and this may be called the music of the heart; third, the music that includes time and emphasis, the hastening and the delay—something in addition that produces not only states of feeling but states of thought. This may be called the music of the head, the music of the brain.

Music expresses feeling and thought without language. It was below and before speech, and it is above and beyond all words. Before man found a name for any thought or thing, he had hopes and fears and passions, and these were rudely expressed in tones.

Of one thing, however, I am certain, and that is that music was born of love. Had there never been any human affection, there never would hav been uttered a strain of music. Possibly some mother, looking in the eyes of her babe, gave the first melody to the enraptured air.

Language is not subtle enough, tender enough, to express all that we feel, and when language fails the highest and deepest longings are translated into music. Music is the sunshine, the climate, of the soul, and it floods the heart with a perfect June.

I am also satisfied that the greatest music is the most marvelous mingling of love and death. Love is the greatest of all passions, and death is its shadow. Death gets all its terror from love, and love gets its intensity, its radiance, its glory, and its rapture from the darkness of death. Love is a flower that grows on the edge of the grave.

The old music for the most part expresses emotion or feeling through time and emphasis, and what is known as melody. Most of the old operas consist of a few melodies connected by unmeaning recitativ. There should be no unmeaning music. It is as though a writer should suddenly leave his subject and write a paragraph consisting of nothing but a repetition of one word, like "the" "the" "the," or "if" "if" "if," varying the repetition of these words, but without meaning, and then resuming the thread of his article.

I am not saying that great music was not produced before Wagner, but I am simply endeavoring to show the steps that hav been taken. It was necessary that all the music should hav been written in order that the greatest might be produced. The same is true of the drama. Thousands and thousands prepared the way for the supreme dramatist as millions prepared the way for the supreme composer.

When I read Shakspere I am astonished that he has expressed so much with common words, to which he seems to giv new meaning; and so when I hear Wagner I exclaim: Is it possible that all this is done with common air?

In Wagner's music there is a touch of chaos that suggests the infinit. The melodies seem strange and changing forms like summer clouds, and weird harmonies come like sounds from the sea brought by fitful winds, and others moan like waves on desolate shores, and mingled with these are shouts of joy, with sighs and sobs and ripples of laughter and the wondrous voices of eternal love.

Wagner is the Shakspere of music. The funeral march for "Siegfried" is the funeral music for all the dead. Should all the gods die, this music would be perfectly appropriate. It is elemental, universal eternal. The love-music in "Tristan and Isolde" is, like "Romeo and Juliet," an expression of the human heart for all time. So the love duet in "The Flying Dutchman" has in it the consecration, the infinit self-denial, of love. The whole heart is given—every note has wings, and rises and poises like an eagle in the heaven of sound.

When I listen to the music of Wagner I see pictures, forms, glimpses of the perfect—the swell of a hip, the wave of a breast, the glance of an eye. I am in the midst of great galleries. Before me are passing the endless panoramas. I see vast landscapes with valleys of verdure and vine, with soaring crags, snow-crowned. I am on the wide seas where countless billows burst into the white caps of joy. I am in the depths of caves o'erwalled with mighty crags, while through some rent I see the eternal stars. In a moment the music becomes a river of melody flowing through some wondrous land—suddenly it falls in strange chasms, and the mighty cataract is changed to seven-hued foam.

Great music is always sad, because it tells us of the perfect, and such is the difference between what we are and that which music suggests, that even in the vase of joy we find some tears.

The music of Wagner has color, and when I hear the violins the morning seems to slowly come. A horn puts a star above the horizon. The night in the purple hum of the bass wanders away like some enormous bee across wide fields of dead clover. The light grows whiter as the violins increase. Color comes from the other instruments, and then the full orchestra floods the world with day.

Wagner seems not only to hav given us new tones, new combinations, but the moment the orchestra begins to play his music, all the instruments are transfigured. They seem to utter the sounds that they hav been longing to utter. The horns run riot, the drums and cymbals join in the general joy. The old bass viols are alive with passion. The 'cellos throb with love, the violins are seized with a divine fury, and the notes rush out eager for the air as pardoned prisoners for the roads and fields.

The music of Wagner is filled with landscapes. There are some strains like midnight thick with constellations, and there are harmonies like islands in the far seas, and others like palms on the desert's edge. His music satisfies the heart and brain. It is not only for the memory—not only for the present, but for prophecy.

Wagner was a sculptor, a painter, in sound. When he died the greatest fountain of melody that ever enchanted the world ceased, but his music will instruct and refine forever.

All that I know about the operas of Wagner I hav learned from Anton Seidl, and I believe that he is the noblest, tenderest, and the most artistic interpreter of Wagner that has ever lived.

IT may be questioned whether a single man, or even a single priest, preacher, or churchman, ever fully "realized" the import of the doctrin that is spoken of as "everlasting punishment in hell." We know the names of several men whom the far-off contemplation of it drove to the madhouse. Nothing but dense ignorance, credulity, mental and moral apathy, wrapping human sensibility about as with the hide of a rhinoceros, enabled them to bear the suggestion of it, and still go on their way believing, hoping, and rejoicing. In proportion as men become intelligent, conscientious, and sensitiv, they throw the incubus off, though with it they cast over creed, church, scripture, and all the associations of religion. For reason is more than all.—O. B. Frothingham.

MY aim has been to prove that the powers before which man crouches are creatures of his own limited, ignorant, uncultured, and timorous mind.—Feuerbach.

The Christian Forgeries in Josephus.

Mr. S. Roberts recurs to an old question in the following letter:

"Last Sunday Rev. Florence E. Kollock, pastor of one of the Universalist churches of this city, in her remarks upon the resurrection of Jesus, read a quotation from Josephus, referring to that portion which says that such a person as Jesus appeared in Judea. I hav heard it asserted by several Liberal thinkers that the passage referring to Jesus was an interpolation by Eusebius. What I wish to know is, if the assertion can be substantiated, and where is the authority for it? Please ventilate the matter through your paper.

"Yours for truth, S. ROBERTS."

It seems necessary to furnish the information necessary to confute the small Christians who refer to Josephus as a reference for Christ about once a year. But first, we desire to assure the aforesaid small Christians that there is no Christian scholar of reputation to-day who pretends that the passage in Josephus's Antiquities, book 18, chapter 3, section 3, is genuin. The facts in the case are about as follows: Its authenticity was given up as long ago as the time of Dr. Nathaniel Lardner (born 1684, died 1768), author of the "Credibility of the Gospel History," and one of the most highly regarded of Christian writers. Gibbon, too, decided it to be a forgery. Bishop Warburton, the distinguished defender of Pope's Essay on Man against the charge of Atheism, and one of the most distinguished of Christian defenders, agreed with Lardner. The Rev. Robert Taylor quotes many other Christian writers as coinciding, and the "Freethinker's Text-Book," Part II, by Annie Besant, adds still other reverends as holding the same opinion. The biographer of Josephus in the Encyclopedia Britannica says the passage is unanimously regarded as spurious. Drs. Oort, Hooykaas, and Kuenen, German Christian writers of great repute, in the "Bible for Learners" declare the passage to be "certainly spurious" and "inserted by a later and a Christian hand."

Gibbon says it was forged between the time of Origen (A.D. 230) and Eusebius (A.D. 315). The credit of the forgery, however, is generally given to Eusebius, who first quoted it. The distinguished authors of the "Bible for Learners" distinctly state that Josephus never mentioned Jesus, and cite Josephus's close following of the atrocious career of Herod, up to the very last moments of his life, without mentioning the slaughter of the innocents, as indubitable proof that Josephus knew nothing of Jesus. Dr. Lardner givs these reasons why he regards the passage as a forgery:

"I do not perceive that we at all want the suspected testimony to Jesus, which was never quoted by any of our Christian ancestors before Eusebius.

"Nor do I recollect that Josephus has anywhere mentioned the name or word Christ, in any of his works; except the testimony above mentioned, and the passage concerning James, the Lord's brother.

"It interrupts the narrativ.

"The language is quite Christian.

"It is not quoted by Chrysostom, though he often refers to Josephus, and could not hav omitted quoting it, had it been then in the text.

"It is not quoted by Photius, though he has three articles concerning Josephus.

"Under the article Justus of Tiberias, this author (Photius) expressly states that the historian (Josephus) being a Jew, has not taken the least notice of Christ.

"Neither Justin in his dialog with Trypho the Jew, nor Clemens Alexandrinus, who made so many extracts from Christian authors, nor Origen against Celsus, hav ever mentioned this testimony.

"But, on the contrary, in chapter xxxv of the first book of that work, Origen openly affirms that Josephus, who had mentioned John the Baptist, did not acknowledge Christ."

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, in his "Lost and Hostil Gospels," though considering it killing dead birds to again examin and discredit the passage, goes into the matter somewhat exhaustivly. He says:

"This passage is first quoted by Eusebius (fl. A.D. 315) in two places (Hist. Eccl., lib. i, c. xi; Demonst. Evang., lib. iii); but it was unknown to Justin Martyr (fl. A.D. 140), Clement of Alexandria (fl. A.D. 192), Tertullian (fl. A.D. 193), and Origen (fl. A.D. 230). Such a testimony would certainly hav been produced by Justin in his apology or in his controversy with Trypho the Jew, had it existed in the copies of Josephus at his time. The silence of Origen is still more significant. Celsus, in his book against Christianity, introduces a Jew. Origen attacks the argument of Celsus and his Jew. He could not hav failed to quote the words of Josephus, whose writings he knew, had the passage existed in the genuin text. He indeed distinctly affirms that Josephus did not believe in Christ (Contr. Cels. i).

"Again, the paragraph interrupts the chain of ideas in the original text. Before this passage comes an account of how Pilate, seeing there was a want of pure drinking water in Jerusalem, conducted a stream into the city from a spring two hundred stadia distant, and ordered that the cost should be defrayed out of the treasury of the Temple. This occasioned a riot. Pilate disguised Roman soldiers as Jews, with swords under their cloaks, and sent them among the rabble, with orders to arrest the ringleaders. This was done. The Jews, finding themselvs set upon by other Jews, fell into confusion. One Jew attacked another, and the whole company of rioters melted away. 'And in this manner,' says Josephus, 'was this insurrection suppressed.' Then follows the paragraph about Jesus, beginning, 'At this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a man,' etc.; and the passage is immediately followed by, 'About this time another misfortune threw the Jews into disturbance, and in Rome an event happened in the temple of Isis which produced great scandal.' And then he tells an indelicate story of religious deception which need not be repeated here. The misfortune which befell the Jews was, as he afterward relates, that Tiberius drove them out of Rome. The reason of this was, he says, that a noble Roman lady, who had become a proselyte, had sent gold and purple to the temple at Jerusalem. But this reason is not sufficient. It is clear from what precedes—a story of a sacerdotal fraud—that there was some connection between the incidents in the mind of Josephus. Probably the Jews had been guilty of religious deceptions in Rome, and had made a business of performing cures and expelling demons with talismans and incantations, and for this had obtained rich payment.

"From the connection that exists between the passage about the 'other misfortune which befell the Jews,' and the former one about the riot suppressed by Pilate, it appears evident that the whole of the paragraph concerning our Lord is an interpolation. That Josephus could not hav written the passage as it stands is clear enough, for only a Christian would speak of Jesus in the terms employed. Josephus was a Pharisee and a Jewish priest. He shows in all his writings that he believes in Judaism.

"It has been suggested that Josephus may hav written about Christ as in the passage quoted but that the portions within the brackets are the interpolations of a Christian copyist. But when these portions within brackets are removed, the passage loses all its interest, and is dry statement, utterly unlike the sort of notice Josephus would hav been likely to insert. He givs color to his narrativs; his incidents are always sketched with vigor. This account would be meager beside those of the riot of the Jews and the rascality of the priests of Isis. Josephus asserts, moreover, that in his time there were four sects among the Jews—the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes, and the sect of Judas of Gamala. He gives tolerably copious particulars about these sects and their teachings, but of the Christian sect he says not a word. Had he wished to write about it, he would hav given full details, likely to interest his readers, and not hav dismissed the subject in a couple of lines.

"It was, perhaps, felt by the early Christians that the silence of Josephus—so famous a historian and Jew—on the life, miracles, and death of the founder of Christianity, was extremely inconvenient; the fact could not fail to be noticed by their adversaries. Some Christian transcriber may hav argued either Josephus knew nothing of the miracles performed by Christ—in which case he is a weighty testimony against them—or he must hav heard of Jesus, but not having deemed his acts, as they were related to him, of sufficient importance to find a place in his history. Arguing thus, the copyist took the opportunity of rectifying the omission written from the standpoint of a Pharisee, and therefore designated the Lord as merely a wise man."

The Rev. Dr. Giles, an English clergyman, author of the "Christian Records," adds to the reasons for rejecting the passage, as follows:

"Those who are best acquainted with the character of Josephus, and the style of his writings, hav no hesitation in condemning this passage as a forgery interpolated in the text during the third century by some pious Christian, who was scandalized that so famous a writer as Josephus should hav taken no notice of the gospels, or of Christ, their subject. But the zeal of the interpolator has outrun his discretion, for we might as well expect to gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles, as to find this notice of Christ among the Judaizing writings of Josephus. It is well known that this author was a zealous Jew, devoted to the laws of Moses and the traditions of his countrymen. How, then, could he hav written that Jesus was the Christ? Such an admission would hav proved him to be a Christian himself, in which case the passage under consideration, too long for a Jew, would hav been far too short for a believer in the new religion, and thus the passage stands forth, like an ill-set jewel, contrasting most inharmoniously with everything around it. If it had been genuin, we might be sure that Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Chrysostom would hav quoted it in their controversies with the Jews, and that Origen or Photius would hav mentioned it. But Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian (i, 11), is the first who quotes it, and our reliance on the judgment or even honesty of this writer is not so great as to allow our considering everything found in his works as undoubtedly genuin."

In Dr. Lardner's time the controversy over this passage was quite warm, and its defenders resorted to all sorts of verbal tricks to keep it as authentic. The Rev. Robert Taylor tells us that they introduced imaginary parentheses, made arbitrary omissions, and mistranslated it in order to make it harmonize with the style of Josephus, and to giv it even the appearance of genuinness. The Abbe Bullet, one of Dr. Lardner's chief opponents, argued that Josephus ought to hav known of Jesus, and that as he gave accounts of all the impostors or heads of parties which arose among the Jews, he must hav spoken of Jesus, and that as Eusebius was the first to discover the passage, Josephus might hav published two editions of his Antiquities, inserting the passage in that one which Eusebius obtained and omitting it in the other! "So struggles," says Dr. Taylor, "conquered sophistry against victorious truth."

Another forged reference to Christ is found in the Antiquities, Book XX, chapter ix, section 1, where Josephus is made to speak of James, "the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ." Some theologians who reject the longer reference to Jesus accept this as genuin. But they do it without reconciling the discrepancies between the stories regarding the end of this same James. According to this passage James was put to death under the order of the high priest. But according to Hegesippus, a converted Jew who wrote a history of the Christian church about A.D. 170, James was killed in a tumult, not by sentence of a court. Clement of Alexandria confirms this, and is quoted by Eusebius accordingly. Eusebius also quotes the line from Josephus, without noticing that the two do not agree. The statement is quoted in various ways in the early writers, and the conclusion is irresistible that the copies of Josephus were tampered with by copyists. Even had Jesus lived and taught as described in the gospels, Josephus, an orthodox Jew, a priest, and conservativ government official, would never hav given him the title of Christ, or messiah, a party leader for whom the Jews were looking to free them from their Roman bondage.

The third and last supposed reference to Jesus to be found in Josephus is found in his discourses on Hades, wherein he says that all men "shall be brought before God the word; for to him hath the father committed all judgment; and he, in order to fulfill the will of his father, shall come as judge, whom we call Christ." But this passage, says Mrs. Besant, supposing it to be genuin, simply refers to the Jewish belief that the Messiah, or the Christ, or the Anointed, was the appointed judge, as the prophet Daniel saw in his vision—the son of man who came with the clouds of heaven and to whom was given dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him. This dominion of the Jews' looked-for Christ was to be everlasting. Josephus was a thorough Jew, and depended a great deal upon the Old Testament, as the fact that the material for his first eleven books of the Antiquities of the Jews is drawn exclusivly from that collection of documents shows. The passage is not quoted as evidence by any but the most ill-informed of Christian writers. The only quotation from Josephus upon which stress is laid is the longer description of Jesus first noticed. But the truth is, and it is universally admitted, that Josephus never heard of that Jesus whom the Christians allege to be the Christ.

The Inspiration of the Bible.

The Bible has been the inspiration of much bloodshed and crime, but that does not affect the question of its own inspiration.

In the first place, who was there to inspire it? We know nothing, nor does anyone, of any power outside of man capable of inspiring a book. So far, also, as we know, nobody but men ever wrote books. And until it is proved in the first place that there is somebody besides man to inspire books, and in the second that there is a book in existence which could not hav been written entirely by men, intelligent people will doubt divine inspiration. We know nothing of Jehovah but what we learn from the Bible. The Bible asserts his existence and offers itself as proof. It is as though a man should walk into another man's office and producing a book, say, "I am the Lord; I made the world; this is my revelation to man." Certainly the man addressed would want more proof before accepting the pretender's say-so. Yet the astonishment of the person addressed would be still greater if the pretender should assert, "I am everywhere; I fill all space; I am without bounds; yet, as you see, I hav the form of a man." He would say that it is impossible to be formless and yet hav form; to be at once infinit and finite. And yet the assurance of the pretender would not be greater than is the impudence of Christians in making such claims for their "God." They make him of chameleon color, changing as the wind, and then claim for him stability. They hav drawn a picture of an omniscient God who knew his own mind scarce twenty-four hours in advance; of an omnipotent God who is weaker than his own creations; of an infinit God with the circumscribed form of a man. Such a God is manifestly impossible. He cannot be one person and yet three; he cannot be omniscient and yet limited in his knowledge; he cannot be omnipotent and yet weaker than his own creatures; he cannot be infallible and yet continually repenting his own works.

So we see that the Bible God cannot be at all. And until it is first proved that there is a divine inspirer we cannot see how there can be a divinely inspired book. There is no book now in existence which was not penned by man. An infallible God could not write a fallible book. That the Bible is fallible its own pages prove, and Christians admit by their continual revisions. The Bible is full of blunders in every department of science. An omniscient God must necessarily know everything. Would he hav written down that which he knew was not so? That would convict himself of falsehood, and he must hav known that for a lying God men could hav no respect.

It must be borne in mind that the Jews did not do all the cruel, barbarous things recorded in the Bible because they were ignorant of its real teachings, but because they were imperativly commanded by it and God to do them. In killing people for changing their religion and for being witches the Christians of later times were not ignorant of the Bible's real teachings, but were acting in exact accordance with its commands. People in those days seem to hav been naturally cruel, and the Bible helped them wonderfully. In it they could find excuses for any conduct, however outrageous. In the Dark Ages murders were not committed by ignorance, but by religion. The most learned were priests, and they were the most cruel. According to the Bible, God himself in his scheme of redemption set an example of infinit cruelty.

To sum the Bible up, it is in conflict with science and morality, is barbarous, cruel, and an unfit guide for any people. It bears undeniable evidence that it was written not only by ignorant men but by men who would be regarded at the present day as barbarians. Its inspiration must be given up because there was no God to inspire it, and if there had been he never would hav inspired such a book.

The Late Howard Crosby, D.D.

It is a trifle wearisome to read so many eulogies of Howard Crosby. De mortui nil nisi bonum is all right if the friends of the deceased do not carry the fulsomeness of epitaph literature to too great a length. Howard Crosby was in many respects a level-headed man. That while possessing great intelligence, he still took the Bible literally and believed it to be plenarily inspired, we will not count against him, as a great many otherwise learned and smart folks hav thought the Bible to be different in some way from other books.

But with Howard Crosby's intellectual orthodoxy, he had also what we may call physical and moral orthodoxy. He believed in deceit, and he also believed in dungeons for heretics.

In January, 1880, D. M. Bennett, the founder of this paper, was in prison because he had mailed a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" to spy Comstock. There never was a man more innocent of real offense than Mr. Bennett. His arrest was due to Comstock's avowed effort, mentioned in his report of 1878, to "stamp out the works of Freethinkers." During that month Comstock's society held its annual meeting, which was largely devoted to chuckling over the fact of Mr. Bennett's imprisonment, and here are two things that Howard Crosby said at that time:

"If this society had never done anything more than put that man Bennett in the Albany penitentiary, the man who was the leader and defender of the propagators of obscenity, it was worth a hundred thousand times more than all our citizens hav given to its treasury."

Mr. Bennett was the leader and defender of Freethinkers, and they it was whom Howard Crosby classed as "propagators of obscenity." He lied in his throat, and he knew it, but he had no more compunctions of conscience at uttering the scoundrelly sentence than he had pity for the Freethinker thrown into prison by Comstock's efforts for the church. At the same meeting he said, referring to Comstock's well-known method of inveigling people into violating the law:

"Deceiving them! I tell you, gentlemen, I believe in deceit. I believe in deceit wherever you hav got a rightful enemy to destroy. Could you carry on a war without deceit? Are you to tell your enemy everything you are going to do? Wherever you hav a rightful enemy, and hav a right under God to destroy him, you hav a right to deceive him."

And at the very time he said that he was Chancellor of the New York University! More Jesuitical, intolerant, and false statement no chancellor of any Roman Catholic university ever made.

"Say nothing but good of the dead," but do not lay it on too thick, lest some lover of truth is provoked to wrath.

The Suppression Societies' Agents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has more than once intimated that the "agents" of the "suppression societies" of this city are men who need watching on the part of honest folks. The general public, it seems, and some of the police magistrates, are at last finding out that we were right, and the reporters hav somewhere found sufficient courage to print the facts about them.

Week before last A. Comstock, known as the agent of the Society for Suppression of Vice, accompanied some policemen to serve warrants against poolsellers which Comstock had secured in February. It is the duty of the police to serve such documents, but with his usual insolent effrontery, Anthony took the lead, and broke open the door of the alleged pool-room. The warrant called for three men, but four were found, and Comstock insisted upon taking all of them. When the case came up for hearing, the district attorney, whose assistance had been asked by the justice, was not there. Mr. Comstock then stated that he had seen the attorney, who had told him that he could not come, but recommended the holding of the four men. He had scarcely said this, when the district attorney came in, who flatly denied having spoken to or seen Mr. Comstock. Then Judge Hogan, who had issued the warrant, and before whom the men were arraigned, said this:

"Anthony Comstock is a man who would stoop to any means to accomplish his end. He has deliberately lied, as no gentleman would do, in order to cover up his mistakes. He thinks himself mightier than the law. Indeed, I think he is laboring under the impression that the statutes were framed especially for his benefit."

The agents for the late Howard Crosby's Society for the Prevention of Crime, of which a bullnecked fellow named Whitney is chief "agent," is also in trouble over the acts of his employees. Before Justice McMahon on the 9th instant was the case of Otto Metz, agent of the society, against Dennis O'Brien, a bartender, for selling a pint of beer to a minor. Daniel B. Curtin gave bail for O'Brien's examination, and while clerk Farrell was making out the bond, Curtin told him that he had been approached by an agent of the society to settle the case for $50. Clerk Farrell reported the matter to the justice. Mr. Curtin repeated his statement and was told to make an affidavit, which he did. The bartender also swore that he had been approached by another agent of the society and asked if his employer would "do business" with the agent.

Dr. Gunn's Society for the Enforcement of Criminal Law, of which Joe Britton is chief "agent," is also accused of trying to get cash illegally through its "agents." One of his detectivs had applied for warrants for a pool-room in Eighth street but could giv no description of the men he wanted to arrest, nor did he know their names. The justice refused the warrants, asking if the detectivs thought police justices were appointed to assist in carrying out blackmailing schemes.

Two days afterward the society's lawyer produced six witnesses. Under examination it developed that all were in the employ of Britton. When the room was raided no one was found, but the following question of the justice was significant: "Did you hear that Britton had offered to settle for six hundred dollars?" It was said that some one told Justice McMahon before the court opened that a demand for $600 had been made by an agent of Britton with a promis that if it was paid, the warrant would not be applied for.

The charters of all these societies should be repealed. The enforcement of law should be done by the regularly constituted authorities and not by private villains.

THERE is one society in this city of which the Ingersoll family evidently approve—the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The report of the organization for last year shows Colonel Ingersoll, his wife, both daughters, and his son-in-law to be members.

THE following resolution was passed at the congress of the National Liberal League (now the American Secular Union) held in Cincinnati, O., in 1879:

"Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to the dissemination, through the mails, or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether 'inspired' or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt its authors and disseminators."

The attention of our present postmaster-general is respectfully called to the resolution, with the hope that he will shortly announce his position as to to the wisdom of disseminating inspired obscenity.

THE log-rolling between Eldridge T. Gerry and the Catholics has been successful in the assembly of the state, and the "Freedom of Worship" bill has passed that body. Gerry has evidently helped the Catholics and now they will help him—if the bill passes the senate and is signed by the Governor—get the bill passed prohibiting the commitment of children under twelve years of age to the state House of Refuge, but dividing them between the protectory and the juvenil asylum, according to the "pull" the two institutions hav with the judges before whom the children are arraigned. Through his Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Gerry has much "influence," and the protectory can take care of itself, because most of the vagrant children are of Catholic parentage, and most of the police justices of the city are political if not religious victims of the same church.

JOHN E. REMSBURG was in New Orleans March 26th. On the 27th he spoke at Ponchatoula, La. From Louisiana he went to Mississippi, where he gave three lectures at Brookhaven. Afterward he spent a week in Florida, lecturing in DeLand, Gainesville, Ocala, and Tampa. The lectures were for the most part well attended and enthusiastically received. Referring to his lecture in Tampa, the daily News of that city says: "The lecture by J. E. Remsburg is highly spoken of by those who heard it. He is probably the finest lecturer who has ever visited Tampa." The credit for arranging for these, the first Freethought lectures delivered in Florida, is due to the following named gentlemen: DeLand, H. A. Bowley; Gainesville, Dr. Wm. H. Bracey; Ocala, Geo. B. Tyler; Tampa, Dr. F. Weightnovel. Mr. Tyler is treasurer of the Republican State League of Florida. Dr. Weightnovel is a friend of Count Tolstoi. He is a Russian scholar and reformer—a political exile—who prefers the climate of Florida to that of Siberia.

Letters from Friends.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You are publishing a splendid paper. You are one of the best editors who ever wrote an article.

Respectfully yours, FRANK W. GREAVES.

BLUFFTON, TEX., March 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I think so much of the paper I cannot do without it. You will please send me "Semitic Gods and the Bible," by D. M. Bennett, also your new leaflet, also your ANNUAL. Yours in truth, D. M. BAKER.

MARIETTA, O., March 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I will cast my vote for R. G. Ingersoll for president of the United States of America in 1892. And, Mr. Editor, please hit the Bible-whangers a little harder. But Heston can beat the world in giving a true cut of those pious frauds. Wishing you all success, I remain, Your friend, DR. OGDEN.

PETERBORO, N. H., May 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Tell Brother Heston that his pictures just knock the time right out of the damned good people here. If they say that they do not believe the Old Testament I just ask them if they believe in Jesus Christ. "Oh, yes," they say. Then I quote some of his sayings. Then they are completely knocked out. Keep right on. Giv them hell.

Yours forever, J. B. RALEIGH.

TOUTE, ILL., April 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see you are trying to wake Wanamaker to the necessity of preventing the holy Bible, on account of obscene language therein contained, from being carried in the mails. A test case might help him to make up his mind about the matter. To save him from the trouble of indecision I hereby pledge $5 (will make it $10 if necessary) toward paying for the prosecution. I would suggest retaining R. G. Ingersoll in the case, if it can be done. Hoping this as a starter may strike the lovers of justice and fair play as the proper thing to do, I am,

Sincerely yours, S. A. COPE.

WEST VIEW, O., March 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to make one or two suggestions in regard to publishing the much-talked-of Pictorial Bible. My idea would be to publish it in parts in pamphlet form, each of a size that would sell for twenty-five cents and so arranged that they could be bound afterward, and hav with each book of the Bible the best authority as to when it was written, whom by, how it came into its present form, and everything connected with its formation. We think that in publishing it in this way and form you would sell many more than in any other way; as many would be apt to be sold at news-depots and other places; and as "silence givs consent," Wanamaker will make no objections to your sending it through the mail. L. C. TANNEY.

SILVER PLUME, COL., March 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The books arrived all safe. "The Pictorial Text-Book" is fine. It is what we needed in the field of Freethought to reach the orthodox. They will look at a picture when they will not read an essay on the same subject. I hav been amused a good deal since I got it. Some will look at it and get mad, throw it to one side; after a sharp discussion, in which Heston is roundly damned, they will again pick it up and look at some more. In fact, they are ashamed of their religion when presented in that form, and are anxious to prove that the picture is false. After a little rolling in mud and filth they retire crestfallen. So the good work goes bravely forward. Long liv Heston and THE TRUTH SEEKER. JOSEPH GALLAGHER.

IPAVA, ILL., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.56 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and invoice of pamphlets received a short time since. I hav been amused, but not agreeably so, at the great difference in the opinions of men and women who are battling for truth. I like the different opinions; but the unpleasant writers, who hav in them a desire to remove or exterminate those who differ with them, are wrong. We must learn to grant as well as receive homage, remembering always that there is a cause for all wrong. If we hav a superior knowledge of life and a better idea of living than others less fortunate, let us by an exemplary life teach others to do good from a sense of right doing. I am fearful that down deep in all our hearts we are a little bit selfish.

Very truly yours, C. S. RANDOLPH.

SALEM, MASS., Feb. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and your "Pictorial Text-Book," cloth. Will you please inform me through THE TRUTH SEEKER if there is any official census of what per cent of the criminals in our prisons and houses of correction, and of the inmates of insane asylums, are furnished by the churches? If so, where can I obtain it? And if not, what would be the proper course to pursue in order to hav a census taken? And can you giv me an idea of what the expense would be of having it done?

Yours for truth and justice, C. E. AMES.

[There is no general census of that nature. Partial censuses may be found in previous TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS, the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and J. E. Remsburg's "False Claims." The government could not be induced to hav such a census taken.—ED. T. S.]

ORILLIA, ONT., March 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Our good friend the English church has just completed a fine church here, and it was arranged that the Lord would be allowed to enter it last Sunday, but the bishop was snowed under on his way from Toronto and it had to be postponed for another week. I do not know if the storm stopped the Lord or not—but I think that was of minor importance, as no one cared whether he came or not. It was the bishop that they were constantly looking for. Finally, when they could not wait any longer, a red-nosed priest with a long white shirt came forward and said that he could preach as well as the bishop, and after making a short speech announced that the collection was $600. This pleased all, and the meeting was closed. We all went home and the Lord flew up through the roof and has not been seen here since. TH. MOFFATT.

FORT ANN, N. Y., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will our Editor giv thanks in his paper to one who sends THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethought gratuitously to a backwoods woman too poor to hav them otherwise? I enjoy them all by myself, and would gladly loan them to help enlighten others, but those around me are all church-goers, too ignorant as yet to appreciate a different thought from what their fathers did. I hav been making a scrap-book out of the pungent editorials, the "Gems of Thought," and the observations of that witty brother of yours. Then I cut out the Bible pictures, and took a leisure afternoon and distributed them evenly among my neighbors within walking distance, as questions to put out in Sabbath-school. In about three weeks I made the same round, with an ear open for remarks of any kind. One family saluted me with, "I burnt up them nasty pictures," and another, "Well, I didn't know there was so many mean things in the Bible," and others omitted to say anything. So you see the kindness of sending the papers sent a little leaven to stir up thought to those that could think. But to the great masses that cannot think, what can anyone do? Please find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. MRS. EMEROY GIBBARD.

BROOKHAVEN, MISS., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Brookhaven is a neat, healthy town, of two thousand inhabitants, on the Illinois Central railroad, one hundred and twenty-nine miles north of New Orleans. It is usually an orderly town, indeed one of very quiet habits; but it has just been shaken from the center to its circumference. A thing has just happened in it that no staid church-member had ever dreamed could take place here—an actual Infidel lecture. Mr. John E. Remsburg, according to appointment, arrived on Saturday, the 28th, and gave us three glorious lectures: "False Claims" that night, "Sabbath Breaking" the following afternoon, and "Bible Morals" Sunday night. Mr. Remsburg is a strong, effectiv speaker, with all the power necessary to interest and instruct an audience. The closest attention was paid to all his utterances, and the brethren were highly edified and much refreshed. Some came long distances from adjoining counties to hear the lectures.

Brother Remsburg is a quiet, modest gentleman, who presents facts and arguments in a masterly, convincing way, and who, like the true, dignified gentleman that he is, scorns to resort to sophistry or personal abuse. S. F. SMURR.

MR. EDITOR: Within find draft for $5 for my renewal and a new subscriber (who votes for the pictures) to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, truth finder, and truth speaker. I hav taken it since Brother Bennett made his journey round the world, and it grows dearer each succeeding year, for it seems plain to me that it is trying to fulfill the request made by its founder when he asks that we continue the work he left unfinished, and in the future I shall do, in my weak way, what little I can to add to its prosperity and the cause it advocates. And Brother Heston, I pray you not to falter in your noble work, for you hav the thanks of many, many friends who are not situated, financially, so as to help you.

May success crown every endeavor of Miss Wixon to giv the true education to the little ones, remembering that as the twig is bent so the tree inclines. And for Miss Gardener I hav only words of praise; also for Mary B. Finch, the song-bird of the West. May they never weary in well doing. And I would not forget the many contributors to your paper, John Peck in particular. I consider him a bushel full to the brim. May his pen never rust for want of use. And I trust that I voice the sentiments of all true Liberals in saying that I mourn the loss of Bradlaugh, Mendum, Kelso, and Geo. M. Boman, four noble men gone, whose places will be hard to fill. E. M. CARR.

MR. EDITOR: "Prohibition vs. Anarchism" (long meter) is good. Happy conception! "They fit each other like the upper and lower jaws of a wild beast." Like pestilence fits famin. Extremes meet. One begets another. Pestilence breeds famin and famin produces pestilence. Twin hags! Take your choice. Whichever you take you'll wish you'd taken the other. Prohibition invented the Inquisition, the rack, the wheel, the pulleys, the pincers, the stake, and the fagot. Therefore Infidels love Prohibition. Prohibition breeds Anarchism and Anarchism breeds Prohibition. Neither one can exist without the other. The fruit of Prohibition is intemperance, insanity, weakness, vice. Ranting, rabid Prohibition parents raise drunken sons. Drunken, debauched parents spawn Prohibition progeny. Both extremes are disease, a curse to the country. Let's put them in a sack together and throw them in the sea. The four-fifths of humanity who occupy temperate, medium grounds should not be annoyed by the hell-raisings of such vermin. The Baltimore Institute of Medicine compiled a record of 5,000 deceased men's habits. Average longevity: Light drinkers, 58 years; moderate drinkers, 56; excessiv drinkers, 52; tea totalers, 53. Showing that nature abhors drunkards and Prohibitionists about equally. One gets drunk on whisky, the other gets drunk on fanaticism. Equally detestable. Equally a nuisance. S. R. S.

DAYTON, WASH., March 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and should miss it sadly if it did not come into our home every week. I loan some of the papers to my lady friends when I can get them to read them. One lady said she would like to read Liberal papers, but disliked to hav such literature in her house, as there were so many of her Christian friends coming in that would see them. The Christians talk a great deal about free moral agency, but I cannot understand how anyone can be a free moral agent who dare not read and discuss any subject, and make the standard of their morals according to their intelligence. I enjoy the "Letters from Friends" very much, and think it a great treat to get the ideas of so many intelligent and able correspondents. But I dislike to see so much discord among Liberals. I agree with W. W. Walker, that it is an easy thing for either party in a controversy to call the other ignorant and superstitious, but that proves nothing and is not Liberal. I believe in investigation and earnest seeking after truth, and when it is once found and established as the truth, accept it as such no matter from what source it comes. When we go to the gold mines to dig the precious dust we do not expect the pure dust without any dirt, but the gold while in the dirt is the same article as when it is cleansed and freed from all rubbish. So with truth. No matter how deep it is buried in rubbish, what search and investigation can purify and establish is the same bright gem on the road to progress. MRS. NANCY A. BOGGS.

OMAHA, NEB., March 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just laid down THE TRUTH SEEKER with its grand mental food, and make a few remarks. It seems at present when I cannot enjoy reading its contents that there must be something wrong in this organization; how long I am going to liv to enjoy it I cannot tell. I shall be eighty-one in a few weeks. Talk of superstition, it seems that everything is permeated with it like scarlet fever. Even the ragpicker is Christian; from that it goes into paper handled by Christian influence; next it goes to the press; next we hav the books, holy Bible, and thousands of other religious ones—all Christian influence. Dear brother, I think there is a fountain of intelligence (March 14th, Robert Swail; please giv us more). I think it will send us into the third heaven. We shall pass the first and second. We are getting a host of great minds besides our beloved Bob. I cannot impose longer on your valuable paper. Let me tell you I hav never regretted one half-hour of reading it. I became a subscriber it must be sixteen years ago. Cottinger in the issue of the 21st givs us more of solid truth. I love to read Brother James Beck's idea on one of the wonders of life. Keep on. Giv us more. Work for harmony in our camp. Pray do not think of Ingersoll being nominated for president. Why, do you know that some lunatic or lunatics will take that valuable man's life, as that cursed brute took Garfield's, in the name of the Lord? Let us know we hav an overwhelming majority. Let our states get wiser.

With kind regards, W. L. GRAY.

MONTESANO, WASH., March 28, 291.

MR. EDITOR: This is a beautiful place for a good town. It is growing steadily, and I think it will be one of the best and largest towns around here, because it is the best place, and the great majority of the people here are unbelievers and Liberals. If only a little more activ and enthusiastic, this queen city of the West will march forward and grow up, and instead of attending to churches the Liberals will work for the welfare of every citizen—of every honest man and woman. Then we shall hav here the paradise on earth. There are only a few orthodox people. Not many go to church, and some of them that go are unbelievers. I went to church about three times. I only went to know what was going on and how they preach now. I was surprised—no progress at all; I think worse than ever. The preacher stands there looking so earnest, as if he was telling the truth. His whole sermon was only talking against Infidels, expressly against Thomas Paine and R. Ingersoll, shouting: "Paine and Ingersoll are tearing down religion! Only tearing down, that's all; they never build up anything!" At last, when the sermon was over, he said: "Don't rush to the door. I want to speak a good word to everybody." He came to me, shook hands with me, and asked me what my name was. I told him. Then he asked if I was a Christian. I answered, "No." And furthermore I said: "You never knew Thomas Paine." "I never did," said he. "I hav been reading some of his works," said I, "for instance, where he said, 'The world is my country, to do good my religion.' There is good moral teaching in that. He was a good man. Good writing we hav from him!" "That's right," he said to me; "come again." Now, how is that? I never went to church since.

Please send three more copies of the ANNUAL.

Yours truly, W. WEDEKEN.

ST. ELMO, TENN., March 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith a copy of an order to John Wanamaker for a Bible. In the way of orders you may consider this unique, but you must also consider it as a very unique book that is ordered.

It is now over four weeks since I sent the original order. We usually get returns from Philadelphia in four days. I conclude he is of my opinion, as he has not sent the book.

It is a curious coincidence that you should send him a Bible by express at almost the same time that I order one from him by mail. His treatment of my order is a plain decision in the case you place before him. Still, it is not so satisfactory as what I hope you will force him to promulgate in writing over his own signature. I am glad to see you holding him up to the gaze of the world as you are doing. Giv him sheol mixed with hell and hades until he decides your question. Very respectfully, L. L. GOODWIN.

ST. ELMO, TENN., March 1, 1891.

JOHN WANAMAKER, Merchant, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Dear Sir: My old Bible, that I carried through the civil war (diamond type), is getting pretty badly worn; besides, it is almost too fine a print for easy reading, even with glasses.

I wish you would send me as good a coarse-type Bible, King James translation, as you can for about $2, by mail, and I will immediately remit the price and postage.

I want you to place on the outside wrapper your name and address in full, so I will know it is from you. And now, to be honest with you, I request this so I can use it as evidence, for if you comply with my request I propose to bring suit against you in the United States courts under the obscenity statutes for mailing an obscene and blasphemous book.

I hav read the Bible pretty thoroughly, and I regard it as the most vulgar, obscene book I hav ever read.

And if there is a God—which I do not believe—and he is a being of purity, goodness, and love, then I denounce the Bible as the most blasphemous book that can be conceived of; for it makes him the author of evil, the creator and upholder of the devil, thus making him a devilish sight worse than the devil. It makes him the author of war, pestilence, and famin, and of all the misery, woe, and injustice that fill the land.

The reason why I request this of you is because I see by the papers that you are interested in the sale of this stink-pot of filth and nastiness, and urge young men and young ladies to buy it and study its contents, while at the same time you are very forward about suppressing some other books not a tenth part as filthy as this one.

You may not be inclined to fill this order. If you do not fill it I shall claim that you are of my opinion concerning the indecent, obscene, and blasphemous character of the Bible.

You can saddle either beast you choose—send the book and be prosecuted, or refuse to send it and thus condemn it as I do. Very respectfully, L. L. GOODWIN.

BRONSTON, KY., April 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I indorse heartily every word of a communication from Bozeman, Mont., by Thos. Burk, which appeared in your issue of March 28th. He certainly hit the spiritual nail square on the head, if it has any head. For the last ten years I hav been an honest investigator of Spiritualism, and up to this time I hav not evidence enough to convince me that a man has another life after this. I hav evidence that convinces me that there is a power or force which seems to be intelligent—that can move articles of furniture, such as tables, chairs, etc., across rooms, and write messages in locked slates. My faith in the last item (locked slates) is weak, not able to stand alone yet. Let me giv you an occurrence which happened several years ago right here where I liv. I vouch for the truthfulness of every word of it. I hav a brother-in-law by the name of Denny, who is a strictly honest, truthful man, and last, but least, a pillar in the Baptist church. He had a young lady in his family by the name of Mary Kelly, who was a bright, honest girl of moderate education. She was employed by Denny as maid of all work. Miss Kelly seems to hav had mediumistic powers. She would place her hands on a small pine table, and there would be taps on the table making a noise like a drop of water falling from an elevation from the table of eight or ten feet. Miss Kelly would answer questions by the raps from the spirits, as she expressed it, rapped out alphabetically. Miss Kelly's powers created quite a stir in our neighborhood. Now, I want strict attention. Denny had three brothers, who lived on a creek eighteen miles distant. Miss Kelly had an uncle by the name of John Caldwell, who had lived most of his life at Steubenville, Ky., thirteen miles distant, but had the year before this occurrence moved to the state of Texas. Denny wished to buy up a lot of hogs. He started early in the morning and went to the creek, eighteen miles distant, to his brother Tom, and bought fifteen hogs from him. From his brother Reuben he bought twenty-five. From his brother Jackson he bought thirty-five. Leaving his hogs at his brother's to be received at a future day, he went to Steubenville, the former residence of John Caldwell. While there the news came from Texas that Caldwell had very recently died. Caldwell being a very worthy and prominent man, the news of his death created quite a sensation at his old home. From Steubenville Denny returned home, arriving about 8 o'clock P.M. of the same day of leaving. After eating his supper he called Miss Kelly and asked her to see if she could call up the rapping spirits. Miss Kelly got her table out and the spirits promptly responded. Denny's first question was, "Mary, tell me how many hogs Brother Tom has for sale." After some rapping Miss Kelly answered, "Fifteen." The next question was, "How many has Brother Reuben?" The answer was rapped out correctly, "Twenty-five." The next question was, "How many has Jackson?" and to his utter astonishment the correct answer was promptly rapped out, "Thirty-five." After waiting a few minutes, Denny said, "Mary, ask the spirits how Uncle John Caldwell is." Miss Kelly, after a very few raps, arose suddenly from the table, exclaiming, "Oh, Uncle John is dead." Now, sir, the foregoing are absolute facts, and the only way that I can account for the absolutely correct answers of Miss Kelly is that it was Denny's mind acting on Miss Kelly's mind in a natural way, but in a way not yet understood. This may be the key to explain or demonstrate modern Spiritualism. Denny was the only person in the house at the time Miss Kelly called up the spirits who could hav answered correctly his four questions. I hav lost sight of Miss Kelly. This rapping annoyed her a great deal. It would rap on her pillow of nights so she could not sleep quietly, and some of her superstitious connections told her she was dealing with wicked spirits, and she gave up the business. J. N. BROWN.

MADISON, GA., March 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The following lines were found among the papers of Ex-Senator Joshua Hill, who lately died in Madison, Ga. Yours truly, A. A. BELL.

WITHOUT A CREED.

(Lines written in view of death, Sunday, Feb. 23, 1879.)

When death shall claim me for his own,
And of this world I cease to be a part,
To those I love I would make known
The oft-expressed desire of my heart.

When well assured that I do sleep
The peaceful slumber that knows no waking,
Then no longer my body keep,
To allow of idle, empty leave-taking.

Apparel such as now I wear,
Plain and modest, avoiding all display,
Clothe me with; but let me cease to bear
A gem or jewel when I am laid away.

Without lesson, prayer, or song,
Bear me to my appointed resting-place
In profoundest stillness—earth's throng
Will neither miss nor mourn my absent face.

I ask no monumental stone
To proclaim and magnify my poor worth;
But something simple, meant alone
To tell the story of my death and birth.

The doubts and hopes that fill my breath
Vainly I've sought to solve in Christian creeds.
Content I am to think at last
That man's only merit consists in deeds.

I know not where power resides,
I know not in whom rests supreme control,
I know not where man's soul abides,
Nor am I certain that man has a soul.

If to reverence nature be a test
Of man's devotion to creativ power,
Then should I feel supremely blest,
Nor fear to meet the inevitable hour.

I go hence: I know not whether
To bright scenes of bliss or dark caves of woe;
Or, it may be that to neither
Nor elsewhere I am destined to go.

Without a creed I leave the world,
Wholly ignorant of a future state;
Like a ship with sails unfurled
I leave the shore; my only pilot, fate. J. H.

LEXINGTON, KY., March 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had one millennium—the absence of war, peace, plenty enough for all. The idle hav lived well during this happy season, while the industrious poor hav starved. A terrible interregnum is taking the place of order. Anarchy now would be a spoiler, instead of a redeeming principle. We do not understand the heroic anarchy of ancient times, when some show of it was necessary to the very existence of liberty. Then Timoleon, weeping, inflicted a death-wound upon his brother, who was an enemy to the freedom and best interests of Corinth. Just men are now often the most weak and inefficient.

During the fermentation and confusion of thought, described by Walt Whitman, literature acquires no permanent character; art has no enchanting features to seize the sinking mind and bear it away from itself. Now is the nick of time. Let Infidels impress upon the human mind a splendid literature, such as the world never before thought of, and a benevolence beyond the highest idealism of virtue. Power is slipping from the hand of the trembling priest. He exalts the clergy above God, and shrieks, "Confess not to the almighty, who pardons you and lets you steal and lie and murder the next day as usual; confess to the priest!" Young ladies take the sacrament, then go into the back streets and beat the harmless, feeble passenger for pastime.

Laundry hands are worked until they die of cancer, by cruel men who are amassing fortunes by the blood and tears of their victims. These men are Christians. The poor hav struggled through the fierce cold of winter, uncared for by the heavenly Christian, but the bleak wind of March brought them on the streets to beg. Then we heard the cry, "Arrest street beggars." Cast-off garments were sent to cover their shuddering forms. Persons called on them piously, without a dime to giv them for bread. "No, that will make even the genteel, industrious ones vicious and idle." But the rich hav taken care to ruin their business in various ways. They should help them before they sink so low. If all suburban lots, if all cheap lands, hav been absorbed by the greedy rich, the praying capitalist, then the poor must fester and rot in fearful holes without decent food, air, regular business, and wages. If Christians, if such persons, are not actual thieves, they may take thought and stop enlisting under the banner of Abaddon. They can restore, they can reclaim, that which is held unjustly. No doubt they should prepare for the recoil of the terrible wave which they hav lashed into foam and fury by their groveling injustice and tyranny, their foolish legislation, and idiotic distribution of lands and property. Something more effectual than the charter of Runnymede must be constructed for their benefit, and by patriots like Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester. With heart burning for his country, he swore by the gullet of God, and per os Deus (the mouth of the almighty), that he would find some way to arrest the horse-leech Henry III. in his shameless career of unjust exactions and extortions, and serpentlike tyranny. The priests are saying now that Christ uses the sacrament for his habitat. God is so powerful, and spirits are nothing; they require no space; a thousand of them could dance on the point of a needle ("and devils, too").

It is well that the hard sense of mankind exists in spite of such ludicrous attempts at logic—miracles, too. And then Rev. Mr. Georgewell's idea that "effects can be independent of usual causes" would dash the mind upon the rocks of uncertainty, and land it where it is now, in the hands of tricksters and hungry liars, who manufacture dreaming idiots to pay their board-bills. Such obliging slaves are without dignity, intelligence, or love of mental progress. The moment we are conscious, if we are healthy, we desire something. A beaming, magnetic hand points to a star. All our energies rush that way. This is the will. Giv the vicious man a chance to reach his star.

Let friends skip over my poor letters, or help me. How beautiful was the letter of C. C. Germann, Bloomdale, O.

Better than pious mysteries or political economy, sweeter than heaven, is the ardent desire, born of reason and purity. Fallacious hopes lead not to inferior organization, but to disorganization, monstrosity, annihilation. ALHAZA.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., April 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In the search for truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, many on all sides seem not to be able to conceive what truth actually is. The truth is hidden in the unsolved mystery of existence. All must agree that it is impossible to discover and positivly reveal to the world the truth. As I said, the nature and character of truth is not correctly or fully comprehended. We exist, but we know not whence we came or whither we go. Positivism and truth are twin brothers. The truth is found, if it is possible to be found, only through positivism. What does truth mean? It means that it is the all in all. If the gospel as taught by different creeds—Christianity, I mean—is true, then God, heaven, and hell are the truth. If not true, then the gospel is a humbug, and God, heaven, and hell a myth. If natural evolution of the spirit, Spiritualism, is true, that is the truth. If not true, then it is a myth. If death is total annihilation, that would be truth. The truth is eternal, whatever it may be.

Beyond the natural we know nothing. It is unthinkable to try to conceive the supernatural. It is a perfect mystery what is beyond this world, to all rational minds. Life and death is, so far as we are concerned in knowledge, as open a question as ever.

Christianity teaches that the gospel is positivly true; and that man is fearfully and wonderfully made—as if man was the only being in existence, when hundreds of others of the animal order exist everywhere in the universe, some superior in some respects to man, and all created by nature and existing in the same conditions of a common destiny. Men and women are only speaking animals. Christians declare that God made man in his own image, with an immortal spirit. These are claims that they affirm to be facts. The knowledge of spirit, what it is and where it is, has never been demonstrated. Then that is all there is about those claims. I am a devotee of the truth. I am entirely disposed to be broad and Liberal and impartial in my views. I would be far happier to know all that concerns my destiny. Knowledge is a blessing, as well as power, and our greatest foes are ignorance and deception.

The world has been disputing and contending about the questions of what is true and what is untrue. It is still going on and the truth is yet undiscovered. In my experience in life I hav found that when people desire to be just and impartial they must take everything into consideration. The diversity of sects and churches is not so strange, after all. All things considered, it is a necessary result of many causes. Surely Freethinkers must respect any conviction that is sincere. The Golden Rule itself justifies that. Do unto others as you would hav them do unto you. Ignorance, vanity, and self-conceit are plentiful. Hypocrisy and shams are what we must watch and expose. The Liberal must practice what he or she preaches. Our words and actions are observed and analyzed. This is an age of responsibility and accountability. Those who bring reproach on the church are the inconsistent and hypocritical.

Great principles of truth will stand, and triumph over all that is false. Religious and civil liberty must be guaranteed to all. Keep church and state separate. Make all mind their own business and keep within bounds. Then all will enjoy their religious and civil rights, and injustice and tyranny disappear. I am a Freethinker, but open to conviction. We must hear all sides, and come to no conclusion only as far as the evidence goes. I do not say there is no God. That would be affirming. As a positivist I could not say that. I am holding off from any dogma. I define my position as Agnostic. It is not in my power nor the whole world combined to solve the mystery of existence. Our duty goes no farther than our knowledge as lovers of the truth. I must recognize what is possible. My Christian friends believe without evidence. I disbelieve for the want of evidence. I know the facts of nature—that all existence is sustained by many causes. Possibly God may exist, but not probably. I say there is no positiv evidence that an almighty God exists. He may exist without this evidence. If so, Agnosticism is the only rational, honest position to take. I will endeavor to do right because it is right. Goodness has its own rewards. I hav found that good and bad conduct hav their own reward and punishment here on earth. If we must differ with others let that difference be respected. Let us be firm, but respectful, to those who believe differently. Liv a moral life and quit making claims about the problems of the unknown. Make the best of life, for the truth is eternal. THOMAS J. CONNERS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Lines

CONCERNING, 1. VIRTUE; 2. CHARITY; 3. WORLDLY PRAISE; 4. ENVY; 5. PLEASURE; 6. FAULTS; 7. OUTWARD THINGS.

He who runs in virtue's way
To win a place and bear the sway;
Who, not from principles divine,
Succeeds to power here in time;
Will finally be brought to know
His virtue is an empty show.
But virtue that is true indeed
From honest motivs doth proceed.

Did charity in all prevail,
No selfishness would dare assail;
But earth would quickly thus become
A paradise, a blessed home.
And sin would be a chaos passed,
No more to man a scorehing blast;
For charity and love combined
Giv happiness condensed, refined

He who little knows the world
Will praise its banners where unfurled;
Will worship at its gaudy shrine,
And call its relics all divine!
While he who knows the world the most
Will never of his knowledge boast;
But rather such will wish to be
Away therefrom, redeemed and free.

As nettles hugged upon the breast
Would soon destroy all quietness;
So envy cherished in the heart
Will cause all comfort to depart.
It leaves a thousand stings indeed,
Enough to make one's spirit bleed;
And justly too it poisons those
Who blindly seek from it repose.

Mental pleasures pure, serene,
Never cloy, as e'er was seen;
But oft repeated they increase
In calm reflection, giving peace;
While sensual pleasures fade and die,
At best their promised joy's a lie.
They do the mental pleasures bind,
Which less improved are less refined.

Better one fault, our own, subdue,
Than find in others one or two;
This eagle eye to other's faults
At our misgiving never halts.
If so, it soon tries to discover
Some faults abroad our own to cover;
Then I for one will first subdue
My greatest faults—let this be true.

While here in time we all should be
From dirt and useless rubbish free,
From everything that dwarfs the mind,
As earthly joys of lowest kind.
Our outward things of care and trust,
If in confusion, dirt, and dust,
Bespeak, I know, just what we are,
Most loudly, too. Let us take care.

My Collection.

MY YOUNG LIBERAL FRIENDS: I am the owner and possessor of a fine collection of mineral specimens, Indian relics, war and other relics, fossils, shells, coins, old books, and curiosities of all kinds from all parts of the world. I am proud of my collection, and I think I hav a right to be, for it has cost me much time and money. I wonder how many of the readers of the Corner hav a collection? I think they should all hav one, for a collection of quaint and curious things affords much pleasure, and besides, there is much to be learned by studying each object carefully. By careful study of each object in my collection, I hav gained many important facts in geology, botany, natural history, archæology, and other important branches of study.

Thinking it would be of interest to the readers of the Corner, I take pleasure in mentioning a few of the most valuable and interesting things in my collection. One shelf of my cabinet contains the Indian relics, arranged in boxes of different sizes, and each relic correctly labeled. This collection of relics is composed of grooved stone axes, a stone hammer, stone and flint war-club heads, spear and arrowheads made of flint, quartz, jasper, agate, etc., a flint scraper, a pottery pipe, a pottery vase, old pottery fragments (grooved, painted, and plain) from South Carolina, New York, Alabama, Arizona, and Kansas; Pueblo pottery fragments, and a white turquoise bead from old ruins in New Mexico (one thousand years old); "wampum," or Indian money used by the North American Indians one hundred years ago; pretty colored beads from Arizona; buttons, nails, paint, and flint from an Indian grave; Indian skulls and other bones, besides a number of unfinished flint and stone implements.

On another shelf, arranged the same as the Indian relics, are the various other relics, of which the following are the most important: A sickle owned by the honored D. M. Bennett about eighteen years ago; a sword and sash used in the great battle of Lundy's Lane, fought during the war of 1812-14 (this sword was also used in the civil war); a small bell made from a piece of the frame on which the old Liberty bell swung; a piece of wood from a mulberry-tree at Washington's old headquarters in Richmond, Va. (it was to this tree that he hitched his horse); old Revolutionary relics from Bemis Heights, near Saratoga; relics from the scene of Burgoyne's surrender; wood containing a minie ball from the battle-field of Spottsylvania; also wood from the fields of Fredericksburg, Seven Pines, Bull Run, and Cold Harbor; a cannon ball from the field of Cold Harbor; a brick and a piece of wood from Libby prison; a copy of the daily Citizen, published at Vicksburg the day before Grant took that city; a copy of the New York Herald as it appeared the morning after Lincoln's assassination; a small plug hat made of United States national greenbacks, redeemed and macerated at the United States treasury; a piece of wood from the house in which Spiritualism originated, 1848; a supplement to the Toledo Blade of Jan. 1, 1846; a pair of cuff-buttons over one hundred years old; a leaf from a copy-book used by Abraham Lincoln when a school-boy; also a book from which he selected his school-day speeches, and one of his old law documents in manuscript; an old certificate bearing the genuin signature of President Jackson and dated Dec. 6, 1830; a $20 Confederate bill dated Richmond, Feb. 17, 1864, and bearing the portrait of Alexander H. Stephens; also an old Missouri defense bond (Confederate); a piece of cloth cut from a flag at Fort Ethan Allen, July 4, 1864; a book and clock from the Johnstown flood; old United States stamps and postal cards; books printed in 1801, 1812, 1845, 1852, etc.; autograph letters of noted people, and many other interesting relics. These relics are all genuin.

I also hav a collection of coins, among which are the following: a Roman coin, 1,500 years old; a Mexican coin, used when Cortes conquered Mexico; old English coins, one being 134 years old; a Spanish coin, 155 years old; and other very old coins, besides coins from the following countries: China, Jamaica, Portugal, Brazil, Venezuela, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Canada, and others.

One shelf of my cabinet is filled with curiosities, such as fine corals, shells, star-fish, sea cookies, sea beans, sea urchins, skate eggs, shark eggs, shark teeth, alligator teeth, barnacles, and other marine curiosities; porcupine quills, cacao beans, live-oak acorns, willow cones, snake rattles, buffalo beans, castor beans, Chinese book, slippers, beads, charms, and napkins; a mounted tarantula and his nest, a mounted horned toad, wood and bark of the redwood tree, bark of the cork tree, lava from volcano, buffalo horn and tooth, hook of the giant fishhook cactus, curious copper calcite, and marl formations, pretty mosses, and other botanical specimens. I also hav many curiosities in the fossil and petrifaction line, such as petrified wood, fossil crinoid heads and stems, fossil fish and snake, petrified wasp's nest, fossil ferns, petrified buffalo meat, petrified moss, fossil shark's tooth, fossil trilobite, fossil sea urchin, fossil coral, petrified fir-gum, fossil bones and shells, fossil marl, fossils from New York, stag horn coral, honeycomb coral, paleo cycles, Missouri river fossils, and other varieties too numerous to mention.

I hav made this account of my collection as brief as possible, but I expect it is too long to find a place in the Corner. If it does escape the waste-basket I hope it will be of interest to the readers of the Corner. I hav just mentioned the most important things in my collection. If any of the children, or anyone, has any Indian relics, or anything quaint and curious that they could add to my collection, send it to me, and I will send you something in return. My collection is growing all the time. Wishing you all success, and hoping this little contribution will be of interest to you—that is, if Miss Wixon accepts it—I remain, Your Liberal friend,

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

Oak Mills, Kan., March 26, 1891.

[Our friend George is very kind to giv us the above account of his fine collection. We hope it may stimulate others to begin a cabinet. It is a great source of education. Some time we may tell you about our collection of curios, minerals, etc., but it is not near as beautiful or as extensiv as the one enumerated above.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

TECUMSEH, NEB., March 17, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I hope this will be in the paper. Papa gave Sister Maggie and Eda a little calf. Papa has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for years. Sister Susie is making a rug; she is five years old. We talk about going to Washington next fall. We are all well.

I am eight years old.

DOROTHA WEDEKIND.

TECUMSEH, NEB., March 16, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My papa takes the paper. I like to look at the pictures and read the Children's Corner. We had five little puppies and gave them all away but one, which we will keep. I would like to correspond with Annie Ballhorn, as we are going to Washington next winter. I guess I will close. Your Freethinker friend,

EDA L. WEDEKIND.

TECUMSEH, NEB., March 17, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. I enjoy the pictures and love to read the Corner. The snow is nearly all gone now and it makes it muddy. I was ten years old the 4th of February. Papa has lots of garden seed. We didn't raise any garden-stuff last year, but papa says he will raise lots of it this year. Our school will begin the 1st of next month. Mr. Warren is going to teach the school. I will be glad when school begins. Mr. Owen Tracy is working for us; he is a good hand. I will close, hoping to see this in print.

Your Freethinker friend,

BERTHA M. WEDEKIND.

POWDER MILL, MONT., March 12, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My uncle takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been reading the Children's Corner, and seeing no letters from any children in this state, I thought it might be interesting to some of the readers of the Corner to hear about this part of the country. There are lots of cattle here, which are rounded up twice each year in the spring for the purpose of branding the calves, and in the fall for gathering the beeves, which are driven in large herds to the railroad, which is about eighty miles from this place.

I am twelve years old, and I am a Freethinker. As this is my first letter, I will close. Hoping to see this in the Corner, I am,

Yours for truth, HARVEY CROSBY.

TECUMSEH, NEB., March 16, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the second time I hav written to the Corner. We are going to Washington next spring. Papa said he would like to get one of those large books. Pa has been taking this paper for three years. I am thirteen years old, and am the oldest of seven girls. We hav a bouncing baby boy now. It is three weeks old. We raised a plenty of potatoes to do us till potatoes come again. We had bad luck this evening. Our family riding pony kicked our favorit colt to death. We were all very sorry; he was so gentle. The Christians hav started a Sunday-school here. They wanted pa to be secretary, and he said he didn't want any truck with it. So they did not take him. The neighbors would stop for us girls to go, but we didn't want to go. I think I will close for fear of the dreadful waste-basket. Hoping to see this in print, I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,

MAGGIE M. WEDEKIND.

VERNON, TEX., March 27, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Mr. O. A. Phelps, of Colorado, has been holding a series of Liberal lectures here, and he suggested we raise some money for Mr. J. H. Cook. I am very much pleased with him. I am a little girl eleven years old, but I hope I may be able to do much for the cause of Freethought and mental liberty.

I am your well-wisher and little friend,

IDA FITZGERALD.

P. S.—You will find $2.35 for Prof. J. H. Cook, of Columbus, Kan. I. F.

[The money has been forwarded. It would save some trouble to the editor if donations would be sent directly to the parties concerned instead of passing through the hands of the editor, who is always very busy. The amounts sent will be acknowledged in the Corner. Again, when it is desired that the editor shall transact business outside of the Corner, at least, stamps should be sent for prepaying postage, a little matter that we are sometimes apt to forget. We are pleased to hear from Ida and hope to hear from her soon again.—ED. C. C.]

A PAGAN HOMILY.—Reflect frequently upon the instability of things, and how fast the scenes of nature are shifted. Matter is in a perpetual flux. Change is always and everywhere at work; it strikes through causes and effects, and leaves nothing fixed and permanent. And then, how near us stand the two vast gulfs of time—the past and the future. Now, is not that man a blockhead that lets momentary things make him proud, or uneasy, or sorrowful, as though they could trouble him long? Remember what an atom you are in the universe, what a minute of immeasurable time falls to your share, and what a small concern you are in the empire of fate. A man misbehaves himself toward me. What is that to me? The action is his, and therefore let him look to it. As for me, I am in the condition that universal nature assigns me. We ought to liv with the gods. This is done by him who always exhibits a soul contented with the appointments of providence. Marcus Aurelius.

TRY-SQUARE:

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Price, $1.50. News of the Week.

P. T. BARNUM died on the 7th.

TENNESSEE has enacted that her school directors shall be able to read and write.

SENATOR EDMUNDS has tendered his resignation, to go into effect November 1st.

REV. GEO. ANDREWS, of Gloucester, Mass., has been arrested for firing his own store.

FOURTEEN states and territories in 1889 and eight in 1890 rejected woman suffrage.

ANNA DICKINSON, lately committed as insane, says she is sane and that her sister confined her illegally.

BELGIAN Catholics are united with the government in opposition to the eight-hour law asked by workingmen's Atheistic organizations.

ANTI-CATHOLICS suggest that a Catholic political party would at least make open the machinations that are now secret, and put public men on record and make them accountable.

Two factions of the Mormon church near Kansas City are warring over a temple site. The branch called Latter Day Saints proclaims that the long-predicted temple will be built by heavenly masons within five years.

THE holy synod of the Russian church has ordered that all converted Jews attend public worship once a week or be deemed to hav relapsed.

MINNESOTA theater managers retaliate for the anti-tights bill with a bill imposing on wearers of low-necked dresses a fine of not less than $500 or imprisonment not less than a year.

PARNELL is keeping up his arduous campaign in Ireland. The clergy are fighting him with bitterness, cloaking their secret political motivs with pretended objections to his immoral relations with Mrs. Shea.

THE shereeff of Wazan, head of Mohammedanism in Morocco, has taken to drink, saying he is saved from breaking the abstinence command of his religion by a miraculous change in the liquor. "True," he says, "the champagne in the bottle is intoxicating, but when poured into the glass in my hand it becomes as simple as water."

THE pope has issued to the Austrian archbishops and bishops a letter stating that "to wish that the Roman pontiff may be subject to no human power . . . is a sacred obligation which concerns the Catholics of all nations," and that the bishops should "apply themselvs to arouse and excite the solicitude of the faithful in this very just cause."

POSSESSIONS of European powers in Africa now stand: France, 7,400,000 square kilometers, 24,000,000 inhabitants; England, including Egypt, 5,000,000 kilometers, 32,000,000 inhabitants; Germany, 2,300,000 kilometers, 7,800,000 inhabitants; Portugal, 2,200,000 kilometers, 10,000,000 inhabitants; Italy, 1,250,000 kilometers, 5,100,000 inhabitants.

SOME sensation has been caused by this utterance of Rev. Washington Gladden, Episcopal, in a New York church: "In ancient times thieving barons with their hands full of blood and plunder were sometimes sainted because they gave generously to monasteries. The modern brigand, who has the trunk line for a highway and state legislatures for tools, is considered by many generous and pious if he givs his money to churches and colleges."

ITALY persists in requiring a satisfactory reply from Secretary Blaine. It has been rumored that she will dismiss American Minister Porter from Rome if not answered by a set date. It is suggested that Russia's friendship for America would induce the sending of French fleets, now at command of the Russo-French alliance, to drive Italian warships from our ports. Italy is on the verge of bankruptcy, and could not carry on war. It is learned that one of the victims of the mob had already confessed, incriminating the Mafia, but his story was so contradictory that it was little heeded.

ELIJAH HEARETH A STILL SMALL VOICE.

And he said, Go forth, and stand upon the mount before the Lord. And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks, before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice. And it was so, when Elijah heard it, that he wrapped his face in his mantle and went out, and stood in the entering in of the cave. And, behold, there came a voice unto him and said, What doest thou here, Elijah?—1 Kings xix, 11, 12, 13.

How so many absurd rules of conduct, as well as so many absurd religious beliefs, hav originated we do not know; nor how it is that they hav become, in all quarters of the world, so deeply impressed on the mind of men; but it is worthy of remark that a belief constantly inculcated during the early years of life, while the brain is impressible, appears to acquire almost the nature of an instinct; and the very essence of an instinct is that it is followed independently of reason.—Darwin.

IT is easy to show, if we hav the exact words of Jesus, that he always was mistaken in some points of the greatest magnitude—in the character of God, the existence of the devil, the eternal damnation of men, in the interpretation of the Old Testament, in the doctrin of demons, in the celebrated prediction of his second coming, and the end of the world within a few years. If religion or Christianity rest on his authority, and that alone, it falls when the foundation falls, and that stands at the mercy of a school-boy.—Theodore Parker.

PRIESTS were the first deluders of mankind,
Who, with vain faith, made all their reason blind;
Not Lucifer himself more proud than they;
And yet persuade the world they must obey;
Of avarice and luxury complain,
And practice all the vices they arraign.
Riches and honor they from laymen reap,
And with dull crambo feed the silly sheep.
As Killigrew buffoons his master, they
Droll on their God, but a much duller way.
With hocus-pocus, and their heavenly fight,
They gain on tender consciences—at night.
Whoever has an over-zealous wife
Becomes the priest's Amphitryo during life.

HOW THE SABBATARIAN FANATICS WOULD INTERFERE WITH OUR MAIL.

Notes and Clippings.

THE French periodical, L'Afrique, which is published in Chartum, reports that the Arabs there hav been holding indignation meetings, protesting against the traffic of rum as conducted by the Christians with the African peoples. Measures were discussed as to how to prevent the admission of these goods.

A UKASE about to be issued withdraws the privilege given to Jewish workmen of residing outside the limits assigned to Jews, and orders the expulsion of those living without the pale. Two years' grace is granted to possessors of real property and one year's grace to others. This will result in the expulsion of fourteen thousand Jews from Moscow.

ADVICES from Camden state that Walt Whitman got out in the mid-April sun and warmth of Thursday of last week propelled in his wheel chair, the first time after four months of imprisonment in his sick-room. He has had the worst winter yet from grip and gastric troubles and threatened blindness, but keeps good spirits, and has a new little forthcoming book in the printer's hands.

THE New York East Conference, Methodist, led by Jim Buckley, has voted that it does not want the museums open on Sundays. The Conference said: "Resolved, That we protest against such opening on the ground that the maintenance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, of opportunity for worship and of suspension of business, is of far more advantage to the classes referred to [working] than the results which might follow from the opening of the museums and libraries." It would be interesting to be told exactly how a workman's visit to a museum is going to prevent Jim from resting, or worshiping, or suspending his business!

A GERMAN-AMERICAN who returned to Berlin and entered business, reports to Americans these taxes that he is asked to pay out of an income of 10,000 marks: "State income tax, 200 marks; city ditto, 150; business tax, 100; rent tax, 100; church tax, 120; commercial chamber tax, 20; old age insurance, 110; accident insurance, 70. Total, 1,870 marks."

A TEXAN who has been strolling over New York for a week expresses surprise at seeing so many well-dressed colored people of both sexes in the streets of this city. He says: "They must get along pretty well here, if you are to judge of the style of their turnout. I hav not seen a ramshackle darkey in this place yet, but then I might see him in the African quarter, for all I know. Most of the blacks I hav seen in the streets wear good clothes, and you can see women in real high-tone fashionable style, without fuss or feathers. I hear that they are now called Afro-American in this part of the country. I always supposed they were the worst-off set here, but you ought to look at some of the white crowds in the Italian-Polish-Russian-Hungarian parts of the city."

THERE is a serious question in regard to Gen. Harrison's traveling library, says the Sun. One Washington correspondent undertakes to catalog some of the books selected for the expedition. He mentions Gen. Lew Wallace's truly moral romance, "Ben Hur," Mr. Carnegie's "An American Four-in-Hand in Europe," Uncle Remus's tales, and "a copy of Balzac's droll stories." This last specification is probably a deliberate and malicious invention. If the "Contes Drolatiques," either in the original or translated, hav a place on the shelvs of the Atzalan, it is merely because Gen. Harrison was misled by the title of the book. As soon as he discovers its true character it will go out of the Atzalan's window. It is not a fit book for young Mr. Russell Harrison to read.

THE Anti-Lottery act of Congress forbids transmission through the mails of any newspaper "containing any list of prizes awarded at the drawings of any lottery." The Charleston News and Courier inquires if th s rules out its issues if they contain lists of the winners at certain church fair raffles in that city, and the post-office department is of opinion that it does. A lottery, in the eye of the department, is "any scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance." Immemorially, long and short terms in the United States Senate hav been drawn for by lot, and the supreme court of Indiana has just decided that candidates at the head of the list with an equal number of votes may settle the right to the office in the same way. To be consistent, therefore, says the World, "Mr. Wanamaker will kindly exclude from the mails any Congressional Records or Indiana or other newspapers giving any account of such drawings." But then, Mr. Wanamaker is not a consistent man. He rules on every question submitted to his department but the one we submitted, and to make exception in our case because the book we asked for a ruling on is the Bible is not consistency. Therefore he will let the Congressional Record into the mails.

THE late Mr. Barnum, like Horace Greeley, says the Sun, was a Universalist throughout his life, and in his will he singled out Universalist institutions to be recipients of his bounty. He believed in the ultimate salvation of all mankind. The tortures of hell seemed to him inconsistent with the divine justice, mercy, and loving kindness. Formerly that belief was looked upon by orthodoxy as a dangerous and pestilent heresy. In 1684 when Joseph Gatchell preached in Massachusetts that "all men should be saved" he was sentenced by the Suffolk county court "to the pillory, and to hav his tongue drawn forth and pierced with a hot iron." In our own day the denunciations of Universalism from orthodox pulpits hav been frequent and violent. Universalists were counted as altogether outside of the evangelical fold, and as little better than Infidels. Mr. Barnum lived to see all this changed. Before he died Protestant orthodoxy had given up the hell doctrin, or at least had ceased to preach it. Even the Presbyterians, in whose formal Confession of Faith it is fundamental, were anxious to get rid of it. More than that, some of their greatest theological leaders had gone further toward overthrowing the authority of scripture generally than any of the founders of Universalism went. As compared with Professor Briggs, Mr. Barnum, prabably, was conservativ in his religious belief. He was not an Agnostic. Universalism is no longer confined to any single Protestant denomination, and therefore the reason for the separate existence of the Universalists as a distinct sect seems to be gone. Mr. Barnum died in the faith which now prevails among Protestants, so far as concerns the salvation of all men.

Christianity and Evolution.

THE LACK OF EVIDENCE.

For over two hundred years after the death of the alleged founder of Christianity the world was left without the smallest particle of evidence of the existence of Jesus as a real character, or of the extraordinary miracles alleged to hav been wrought by him to demonstrate his divine mission. And yet these things are of such an extraordinary character that one would naturally think that the early Christians would hav fortified themselvs against adverse criticism by collecting on the spot the strongest evidence attainable—viz., the evidence of eye-witnesses. When, however, evidence is advanced—we hav numerous gospels and epistles put forward to demonstrate the reality of Jesus and the efficiency of his teachings to effect the salvation of mankind.

These books it was soon seen were not in themselvs evidence of the truth of anything alleged therein, but required independent and outside evidence to support them. Now, it was just this outside evidence that was not forthcoming.

And right here it is important to remark that ordinary evidence—the evidence of eye-witnesses of the wonders alleged to hav been wrought by Jesus—should hav been easily obtained; for if Jesus opened the eyes of the blind, healed the leper, made the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, the lame to walk, and the dead to come out of their tombs, there must hav been hundreds who would hav been glad to giv evidence and who would hav hastened to hav given their testimony, if not during the lifetime of Jesus, certainly very shortly after. When, in addition to these miracles, we hav such extraordinary events recorded as a three hours' darkness over the land; an earthquake which rent the temple and opened hundreds of graves; a number of resurrected corpses walking about the streets of Jerusalem; Jesus himself rising from the dead and ascending bodily into heaven—it is easy to understand how, if these things happened, thousands of witnesses would hav voluntarily come forward to testify concerning them. But contemporary history is silent respecting these events. There were several historians ready to record such events if they had known anything about them; plenty capable of describing all these alleged phenomena in glowing and effectiv language—but they are silent. Why should they be silent if these things were true? They hav faithfully recorded events, comparativly speaking, trivial when compared with these. Why, then, were they silent? Not because they were dishonest, not because they desired to suppress the truth; but simply because they had no knowledge of these alleged occurrences. With good reason Gibbon asks: "How shall we excuse the supine inattention of the pagan and philosophic world to those evidences which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? During the age of Christ, of his apostles, and of their first disciples the doctrin which they preached was confirmed by innumerable prodigies. The lame walked, the blind saw, the sick were healed, the dead were raised, demons were expelled, the laws of nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the church. But the sages of Greece and Rome turned aside from the awful spectacle, and pursuing the ordinary occupations of life and study, appeared unconscious of any alteration in the moral or physical government of the world. Under the reign of Tiberius the whole earth, or at least a celebrated province of the Roman empire, was involved in a preternatural darkness of three hours. Even this miraculous event, which ought to hav excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of science and history. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must hav experienced the immediate effects, or received the earliest intelligence of the prodigy. Each of these philosophers, in a laborious work, has recorded all the great phenomena of nature—earthquakes, meteors, comets, and eclipses—which his indefatigable curiosity could collect. Both the one and the other hav omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe. A distinct chapter of Pliny is designed for eclipses of an extraordinary nature and unusual duration; but he contents himself with describing the singular defect of light which followed the murder of Cæsar, when, during the greater part of the year, the orb of the sun appeared pale and without splendor. This season of obscurity, which cannot surely be compared with the preternatural darkness of the passion, had been already celebrated by most of the poets and historians of that memorable age" (Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. ii, pp. 191, 192, ed. 1821).

If the silence of pagan historians is remarkable, the silence of all the great Jewish writers is more extraordinary still. Why should not Josephus hav something to say on the subject? Except the forged passage—which did not appear in the oldest manuscripts—not a single mention of Jesus or his wonderful doings can be found in any of this learned author's works.

There were, moreover, many other great Jewish writers who might reasonably hav been expected to hav said something concerning Jesus and his alleged resurrection if they had heard anything about either the one or the other.

"Nicholas of Damascus, who preceded Josephus, and lived to the time of Herod's successor Archelaus; and Justus of Tiberias, who was contemporary and rival of Josephus in Galilee, equally knew nothing of the movement. Philo-Judæus, who occupied the whole period ascribed to Jesus and engaged himself deeply in figuring out the Logos, had heard nothing of the being who was realizing at Jerusalem the image his fancy was creating." (See Judge Strange's "Portraiture and Mission of Jesus," page 27.)

From this, then, it is quite clear that so far as any direct evidence regarding the reality of Jesus or the alleged occurrences surrounding his career is concerned, none was available during the first two centuries of the Christian era, and whatever evidence was adduced after that was not only worthless in itself but often exhibited the worst characteristics of daring and wicked forgeries.

MANUFACTURED EVIDENCE.

Already I hav pointed out that, during the first three or four centuries, a large number of gospels appeared which are now admitted by Christians to be spurious. It is also admitted that these gospels were written by persons calling themselvs "Christians;" and it is further acknowledged that these "pious" persons manufactured these gospels for what they regarded as a very good purpose, viz.: to strengthen and support the Christian faith.

Well, if Christians were capable of manufacturing one class of supposed evidence in support of Christianity, it is rational to suppose that they were capable of manufacturing another. And the examination of the matter put forward as evidence by Christians demonstrates this beyond doubt.

Let us take the famous passage inserted in Josephus relating to Jesus Christ. It runs as follows: "Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was the doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the gentiles. He was [the] Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians so named from him, are not extinct at this day" (Antiquities of the Jews, book xviii, chapter iii, sect. 3).

Now, this passage has the stamp of fraud upon it; it carries the evidence of its forgery clearly upon its face. In the first place, it would hav been impossible for Josephus to hav written that Jesus was the Christ and remained a Jew. For him to hav made such a declaration would hav converted him at once into a Christian. Moreover, Jews did not regard men as Gods because they were capable of performing wonders; otherwise they would hav had a whole tribe of gods to worship.

Nor could Josephus hav written that the Christians were "not extinct," since he must hav known that, mainly through the persecution they received from Nero in Rome, they continued to increase right up to the time of his death. It is satisfactory, however, to know that nearly every scholar of note has given the passage up. It is now admitted to be a flagrant forgery. Even Dr. Farrar, in his "Life of Christ," does not pretend that the passage is authentic. Among the great writers who gave up the passage were Lardner, Gibbon, Bishop Warburton, Dr. Giles, and many others; while Dr. Paley and Renan believed in its authenticity. In the early ages not only were spurious passages inserted in authentic works of great authors, but whole pieces were produced of a forged character, and attributed to writers of reputation.

Mosheim, the great ecclesiastical historian, and Dr. Pye Smith affirm that the early ages of Christianity were remarkable for these artful and unscrupulous copyists. Bishop Faustus (quoted by Lardner; read also J. M. Wheeler on "Frauds and Follies of the Early Fathers") makes this clear in the following passage: "It is certain," he says, "that the New Testament was not written by Christ himself nor by his apostles, but a long while after them, by some unknown persons who, lest they should not be credited when they wrote of affairs they were not acquainted with, affixed to their works the names of apostles or of such as were supposed to hav been their companions, asserting that what they had written themselvs was written according to those persons to whom they ascribed it."

At best the authorized version of the New Testament is but a copy of a copy of a number of copies of an original of which no man knows anything. Dean Alford, who declares that he read in the Vatican library at Rome the oldest existing manuscripts of the text, remarks: "A formidable list of passages might be given in which our version either has confessedly misrendered the original or has followed a form of the text now well known not to hav been the original form." This view is also taken by Dr. Giles, Professor Norton, and others, who point out many passages which are, in their judgment, unmistakably spurious.

Dr. Paley thought that one of the strongest pieces of evidence of the truth of the Christian religion was to be seen in the fact that many of the early Christians suffered death rather than giv up the faith that was in them. By this method all religions could be shown to be true, for all of them hav had their martyrs. The truth is that the willingness of a believer to die for his religion does not prove the truth of that religion; it only demonstrates the sincerity of the believer. Paley also brings forward Tacitus, who was born A.D. 54 and died A.D. 134; Suetonius, born A.D. 65, died in the second century; Pliny the Younger, born A.D. 61, died A.D 115, and others, but all these writers—even supposing the passages quoted to be authentic, which there are strong reasons for believing they are not—are really out of court.

None of them knew Jesus. None of them saw him perform any of the wonders recorded in the gospels; none of them were even acquainted with anybody who did see them. What value therefore can be attached to their evidence? Very little if any. It is extremely doubtful whether either of them refers to the Jesus of the gospels, although in the one case we hav the name of a person called by his followers "Christ," and in another, "Christus." In neither of these cases hav we any guarantee that the person mentioned is the same. Gerald Massey has marshaled a good deal of evidence to show that the historical Jesus appeared in Egypt two centuries before the alleged birth of the Nazarene carpenter. Even the gospels acknowledged that many false Christs appeared; how, therefore, can we, living two thousand years after the alleged events, judge between the true and the false when the only evidence we hav upon which to form a judgment is not only tainted with fraud and forgery, but if true, is not the evidence of eye-witnesses?

However, such as the evidence is, we will examin it; we will sift it to the very bottom and show how it was manufactured; how creeds grew out of it; how the gospels were subsequently altered to fit in with this manufactured testimony. Christianity is not one consistent system; it is a thing of patchwork, it is the result of years and years of growth, of alterations or improvements made by successiv generations of believers; but as Christians hav never been agreed as to what Christianity really is, one sect arguing for one thing, another for another; one desiring to cut out certain passages from the New Testament, another for leaving them alone, it has come down to us as an inconsistent mass of statements concerning Jesus and an absurd and impracticable set of teachings which believers consider themselvs at liberty to interpret according to their own feelings and desires, without the slightest reference to the clear and palpable meaning of the words.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Spiritology.

I will say to Mr. T. E. Longshore and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I am a truth seeker, and hav been, I can truly say, about as far back as I can recollect. I hav the wrong kind of a head for a believer. I hav yet to see a more skeptical or suspicious person than myself. But I am an investigator. I search for the cause, the why and the wherefore, of every phenomenon that comes within my observation. The more mysterious or hidden, and the more dangerous to human happiness, the greater has been my desire to learn the cause, and how to prevent or remedy evils. All the great questions of the day hav claimed my attention more or less—religion, morals, government, and science. These general headings cover the ground of modern thought.

Certain facts in nature, on which a new discovered science is founded, hav claimed my attention for nearly ten years; but Mr. Longshore thinks this is much too short a time to make valuable discoveries and solve "the mysteries of the nervous system, which hav not been solved by centuries of study and investigation of experts and specialists." I am glad to be able to assure Mr. Longshore that this science solves these "mysteries of the nervous system," and also solves the mystery of "witches, ghosts, angels, spirits, signs, and omens;" it makes clear the cause of what people hav cataloged under these headings. I will say again, I know what I here affirm as well as I know any of the demonstrated facts in life; and I also know that any "healthy, vigorous, critical, observing man," with "robust doubt," if he is an honest investigator, can get this knowledge by observation of the facts, by experimentation; but there are smart persons who go into a circle with the secret intention of exposing the medium, of proving the whole business a fraud; such persons are not investigators, and are as much out of place in a séance room as a razorback hog in a parlor.

I learn that Mr. T. E. Longshore is a physician. I am glad of this, for the study of the human system in health and disease, in all its varied manifestations both in body and mind, is the special business of the doctors, and this has been one of the subjects that hav claimed my attention, and I hav made some discoveries of valuable drug remedies, as well as the cause, nature, and remedy of the evil consequences of what the doctor calls "mysteries of the nervous system," which, he affirms, "hav been the means of deceiving millions;" and of "haunting, harassing, and beleaguering human beings day and night, . . . working out their fatal consequences."

The doctor writes as though he knew considerable of evils afflicting humanity, the cause and remedy of which are entirely unknown to him, and he is very anxious that other people should remain as ignorant as himself, and sounds the alarm in unison with other allopathic doctors, religious fanatics, and know-all Materialists.

The doctor seriously questions my ability to observe and judge correctly; he places me among that "flabby, uncritical" class of people who with eyes and mouth open behold any common or uncommon phenomenon without ever a thought of the cause or the moving power back of it; this he has evidently done to weaken the force and effect of what I hav said, and prevent investigation by others by making people believe I am only a common fool, and anything I may say is unworthy of attention.

The doctor has certainly failed to learn the difference between knowledge and belief and the processes by which each is acquired.

I will quote from his article: "Knowledge obtained without the use in acquiring it of all or a majority of the senses, or from those who hav used all their senses in acquiring it, combined with a well-grounded judgment, formed from varied and extensiv past experience, cannot be safely trusted."

Knowledge on the subject under discussion can only be got by personal observation and experience, and not, as the doctor affirms, "from those who hav used all their senses in acquiring it." Real knowledge is not transferable. Transferred, it becomes belief. The doctor belongs to that numerous class of persons who hav not yet learned that there is any difference between knowledge and belief. For my part, I am not writing these articles to giv knowledge or belief to anyone, but to set honest, earnest, thoughtful men and women to thinking and investigating for themselvs.

I will now giv a concise statement of the senses I hav used in acquiring the knowledge that people liv after going through so-called death; and in a future article I expect to giv some of the details of the facts I hav observed.

I hav seen my father, mother, and one of my sisters materialized. I knew them. I hav seen many other spirits, and many strange things done by spirits. Here I used one of the senses.

I hav heard writing being done between two slates; spirit-raps thousands of times; music played, talking, singing, and dancing done by spirits. This counts two of the senses.

I hav shaken hands with spirits, and had their hands on me a great many times. This is three, a majority of the senses.

My investigation was made through developed mediums—persons who, the doctor says, hav the "proper, sensitiv, necessary nervous system." I had the most "robust doubt," for I did not believe that people lived after going through so-called death, any more than a lamp givs light after it is blown out; but, as requested, I behaved myself, sitting quietly, but my thinker was going about as activly as a cyclone.

But if the doctor should attempt to make an investigation, he would surely want to whistle and dance to keep up his courage, for throughout his whole article he has exhibited great fear of these "weird, nondescript intruders from the unexplored realms, that hav haunted, harassed, and beleaguered people day and night;" and I cannot help but think that, doctor as he is, he rejoices in his ignorance of both the cause of these, to him, mysteries, and the remedy of the evils produced, principally, if not altogether, by lack of knowledge of their true cause, which has been discovered through mediumship, and will establish a science which will remove the mystery, fear, and ignorance of the life after so-called death from the minds of mankind, and thereby destroy the very foundations of religion; but the doctor would frighten people from making this investigation by telling of the direful consequences of getting knowledge on this subject. My experience is, ignorance protects no one, and it is a very lean, barren bliss it brings to its worshipers.

The doctor has formed far too hasty and mystical a judgment as to the number of senses used in many instances to acquire true knowledge. For example, I will call attention to the world-acknowledged sciences, mathematics, geology, and astronomy. Mathematics is said to be the most exact science known, and seeing is the sense used by investigators of mathematics. Some may say hearing also, as in oral instruction by a teacher, but seeing is the only essential sense used.

Geology, as a science, has done good work toward destroying superstition, and seeing is the sense employed by investigators of this science. Feeling may be used, but it can add but little, if any, to what is learned by sight.

Astronomy has done its work in destroying the fictions of the gods, as to the operation and organization of the universe; and seeing is the only sense used by the investigators of astronomy, there being no possible use for hearing, tasting, or smelling.

If the doctor turns his battery on these sciences, can he knock them out of the minds of intelligent people, because they are known to exist only by "a clamorous testimony" of one or two of the senses?

According to the doctor's own proposition, Spiritology has a wider and more solid basis, and is proved true by the use of more of the senses, than either of the three great sciences, mathematics, geology, or astronomy; for in investigating Spiritology seeing, hearing, and feeling are each and all often used, and occasionally smelling also, as the smell of a sickroom in diphtheria or typhoid fever, or the smell of certain drugs or perfumery reproduced to bring a more "clamorous testimony" to the mind of the investigator of a special time in the past, when the same smell was present in connection with the operating spirit while yet in the earth life. Here four out of the five senses hav been and can be used in investigating this science. How many of the sciences that hav been discovered will admit of the use of more of the senses in their investigation?

How about the "healthy culprit, . . . who died from hemorrhage, but without losing a drop of blood, . . . killed without the presence of spirits?"

The culprit himself was a spirit, and the medical experts about him were each a spirit, all in their earth bodies, not to mention the fact that no human being is ever alone. These invisible people are always about everyone. But I will refer the doctor to mesmerism, which is so little, if at all, understood by many so-called specialists and experts, for the explanation of the culprit's death. These medical experts murdered this man with their magnetism, as surely as if they had stuck a dagger in his heart.

The control of a spirit in the body over a spirit in the body is mesmerism; the control of a spirit out of the body over a spirit in the body is spirit control or mediumship. In one case the control is visible; in the other, invisible. Any person who can be mesmerized can be developed into an operating medium; mesmerizing a person aids in developing his or her mediumship.

Mesmerism is one of the phases of this science I call Spiritology.

The doctor attributes facts he does not understand to "credulity," as the pious do facts they do not understand to the supernatural.

There are two kinds of "flimsy"-minded people. Each has a large supply of "credulity." One accepts everything with eyes and mouth open, without reason or thought; the other, credulous of his own ability, wisdom, and learning, shuts his eyes and mind against anything as a fraud that he cannot comprehend at a glance. I would be delighted to be with the doctor in his own home, with a strong, well developed physical medium. In the full light of day, when all present were sitting quietly, raps could be heard on the door, window, floor, ceiling, and furniture, and articles in the room would be moved about without contact. If such an exhibition of hidden power could not make him an investigator of spirit phenomena, I should pronounce him impervious to the evidence of facts, and too full of "credulity" to desire to learn more than he already knows.

The doctor's expression, "The spirits need the dark," is proof to me that he knows little or nothing about spirit phenomena, and all his article testifies to the same ignorance. I hav seen, heard, and felt a variety of spirit phenomena in the full light of day and in bright lamplight at night. Many of the manifestations take place in the dark, or dim light. Bright light disturbs some of the elements that spirits use, requiring more strength and power in the light to make the same manifestation.

The doctor says, "If the visits of the spirits are confined to the people of this flimsy type" (meaning those who comply with conditions) "they may answer for their amusement and instruction, but it is difficult to see of what practical use they can be in the sterner works and walks of life," and to what extent they can prove their own existence.

Does the doctor class in this "flimsy type" D. M. Bennett, founder and former editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER; Horace Greeley, Ben Wade, and Abraham Lincoln, all of whom the spirits did "visit" and communicate with, and thousands of intelligent and thoughtful people who are communicating with spirits every day—but it appears that many did not and do not make a racket, like Willis, about this business, for fear of the ostracism, abuse, and persecution from both religious and irreligious fanatics.

The doctor questions the "practical use" to be derived from the knowledge of this science. I will make a brief statement. It produces the proof that people liv after so-called death; it destroys religion and all its paraphernalia; it teaches absolute justice, in that no one can escape the consequences of his or her acts; it testifies, in unison with other sciences, that the law of cause and effect is the only governing power in the universe; it makes known the fact that all kinds of diseases can be cured with magnetism better than with drugs; and it presents to mankind the cause, prevention, and cure of insanity.

Now, I mean exactly what I say; and, if not during my earth life, in the future, every proposition I hav here made will be established beyond the least shadow of a doubt.

The directions I gave to the Brotherhood of Moralists are the most practical for investigators who know but little or nothing about the facts of this science. As soon as a circle begin to get communications, the sitters can get instructions as to who is the medium and how to sit to get the best development and the strongest manifestations.

Every science has always existed, whether known or unknown, and depends on facts in nature for its existence; but every religion has been made by man, had its beginning and will hav its end. It depends altogether on belief for its existence, and when belief in it ceases, it no longer exists.

Spiritology depends on facts in nature, and exists whether known or unknown. These facts exist independent of knowledge or belief, and, like the facts of astronomy and geology, existed before discovered by man; and also when many of these facts were observed, but not understood, and people had very erroneous ideas of their real nature. And in like manner, throughout past ages of traditional and recorded history, spirit manifestations hav occurred, but were greatly misunderstood, at least by the great mass of mankind; and crafty priests and pious people, sustained by this ignorance, were enabled to use these manifestations to support religion. Some phenomena they attributed to the work of the gods and called these miracles; and others to the work of devils, which they called witchcraft.

When spirit manifestations began in 1848 through mediums in the Fox family, the ideas of miracles and witchcraft had lost their strong hold on mankind and could not be revived; but religion still held its grip, though greatly weakened, on these manifestations. The idea of their origin from gods and devils changed to their real cause, human beings living outside their earth bodies; and the final outcome of this communication between earth and spirit-life destroys religion and establishes the grandest and most useful science that has yet been discovered by man.

The world is full of "smart" people, who are not either deep or systematic thinkers, who make foolish assumptions, ask foolish questions, and jump at very erroneous conclusions. For the benefit of this class of persons, I will make a few remarks on spirits.

A spirit is matter, material, not immaterial. An immaterial thing is not anything, and has no existence, is not.

Can two kinds of matter occupy the same space at the same time?

Are light, heat, magnetism, and electricity material or immaterial? If immaterial, there are four things that are known to exist that do not exist.

Light occupies the same space with the air without displacing it. It passes through glass without making a hole, and so does heat; magnetism and electricity occupy the same space at the same time with other bodies, which we call solids, and pass through them without making a hole.

The spirit is the real being, who sees, hears, feels, tastes, and smells; who thinks, reasons, remembers, loves, and hates, and is the finer being or matter that occupies the earth body, as light, heat, magnetism, and elasticity occupy the same space at the same time with other bodies.

A spirit passes through solids, glass windows, iron or wood doors, and solid walls, as light, heat, magnetism, and electricity pass through various substances without making a hole.

Because spirits are usually invisible to people in earth life, many deny their existence, seeming to forget that many invisible things exist, as air, and most, if not all, of the gases, are invisible; and water becomes invisible by evaporating, but under proper conditions becomes visible again.

When a spirit leaves the earth-body, it becomes invisible to ordinary sight, but with the proper conditions can again, like water, become visible.

Enemies to this knowledge do very shallow thinking and no investigating, but they are excellent hands at blowing and striking at facts. They neither know nor desire to know anything about them, or they would spend their time at the more intelligent and useful business, investigating.

I thank Mr. T. E. Longshore for his criticism; I am at home on this subject, of which I hav been a critical, thoughtful observer and investigator.

Our London Letter.

The action of those pious individuals who make a practice of attending horse-races for the ostensible purpose of giving away tracts warning the other visitors of the sin of going to such places has always been looked upon with a certain amount of suspicion by the undevout, and that such suspicion is not without reasonable ground is confirmed by the bankruptcy examination of the secretary of the Prayer-Book Revision Society. His liabilities were considerable and his assets nil. He attributed his difficulties to advances he had made to the society and non-payment of his salary and expenses, and it was only on cross-examination it was shown that his losses were brought about by card-playing and betting. Of course he was most virtuously indignant that these matters should be gone into, and he considered himself so much aggrieved and injured that he intends at some future time to proceed against those persons who hav exposed him for libel. He modestly informed the court that he and his work had been highly spoken of, and it had been said of him that he was the right stamp of man for these perilous times, and would that there were more like him. He did not say whether it was the professional bookmakers who pocketed his losses that gave him such a valuable testimonial. No doubt his fellow race-course missionaries will be estimated at their proper value.

I hav been informed that the Zenana mission does a valuable work in the East for the cause of Christianity, but did not know till just recently that one of its most important works is to introduce dressed dolls into Indian harems. How this furthers Christianity I do not quite understand, but should imagin it savors more of commercial enterprise, something of the same nature as the diffusion of "moral pocket-handkerchiefs." It would be interesting to know the cost price of these articles of merchandise and what is realized by the sale of same, what is done with the profits and with the donations of the faithful for the furtherance of the good work.

In the debate on the Clergy Disciplin (Immorality) bill, it was stated that the bill was not required on account of the vice of the clergy, but in the temptations thrown in their way, and while they are an exceptionally moral body of men, still among twenty-three thousand of them there must always be a certain definit proportion of black sheep. This refers to the state clergy only, as bishops hav no power over dissenters and other religious bodies. Now, as it is stated that these men when they are turned into priests are filled with the "Holy Ghost," I fail to see why any single member should be worse than the whole number. Surely the afflatus is as powerful in one as in another. At all events, it has never been claimed by the church that the case is otherwise. Consequently, if there were any truth in the inspiration theory—and the clergy all declare that it is absolutely true—the regular army of state parsons would be paragons of virtue, while the irregulars or dissenting parsons would be steeped in vice. As this is not the case, it effectually disposes of the benefit of "the laying-on of hands" by the bishops.

Booth's idea of the "millennium" is somewhat peculiar; he fondly hopes that London may become the new Jerusalem, when Hyde park is to be "roofed in with towers climbing toward the stars as the world's great, grand, central temple," and pictures to himself the demonstrations, processions, assemblies, and reviews, while the streets are to be impassable with the joyful multitude going to and fro, though how they can go to and fro in an impassable street is not explained. At 12:30 each day all business is to be suspended, and the entire population of the city will be prostrate in prayer and thanksgiving. Booth evidently is an imitator of Mohammed, and if he could only use the sword as well as the word, he would in all probability succeed in founding a new religion.

There is a sect called the Gospel Messengers near London, who started two years ago with three members, and are now becoming an important body. The meeting-houses are known as "havens," and the members are distinguished as "comets, planets, stars, first and second lights, and tried men and women." They rejoice in the possession of a banjo and tin-whistle band, and an official journal. If they continue to increase in the same ratio, in no long time they will become formidable rivals to the Salvation Army. Truly the Lord manifests himself in many ways and divers manners.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Freethought is booming in Belgium. The formation of five new societies is reported in the last number of La Raison.

Eleven new auxiliary societies and six individual members comprise the February acquisitions to the French Freethought Federation.

We never pick up a Spanish, Belgian, or French Freethought exchange but to find the announcement of a number of civil marriages. In these countries people are proud to assert their independence of clerical rule and official custom.

Germany has now got a badge of her own. A female figure representing truth, who in one hand holds a burning torch, in the other a palm branch (peace), stands on the globe. In the background sun and stars are visible.

Mr. Aug. Kruhl-Hirschberg has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment by the court of Schweidnitz for the terrible crime of blasphemy of the Holy Ghost and slander of the "only" true church. Not possessing a copy of the law under which he was condemned, we are unable to giv more than a general statement of the fact.

For the benefit of those of our German Roman Catholic friends who possess more faith than common sense, we are happy to announce that some time during this year the "holy rock" will be exhibited at Trier. Last fall a number of ecclesiastic and lay experts "scientifically" examined the rock and found it O. K. We do not know what diseases this rock can cure, but we suppose that a solid application of it on the heads of the clerical frauds will rid the world of a public nuisance.

The spirit of Rationalism is slowly working its way into the minds of the Scandinavians. We are the recipient of Gristan, a radical weekly, published in Minneapolis, Minn., by the well-known Scandinavian Freethinker, Axel Lundeberg, who is author of several anti-orthodox pamphlets of considerable merit. The paper is not, however, an out and out Freethought journal, but a very Liberal Unitarian publication. We wish our new contemporary success in his mission, for even Unitarianism is better than evangelical Christianity.

That our readers may hav an idea of how persons in Germany who leave the state church are treated, we giv the following instance: A German Freethinker left the state church a short time ago, and the clergy, full of rage, caused his name to be publicly read from every pulpit in the city on three successiv Sundays, and afterward to be published in a religious journal. But, unfortunately for the clergy, they struck the wrong man; for, angry over the treatment he had been subjected to, he agitated for a wholesale exodus from the church, and already, through his instrumentality, twenty persons hav left it and more are to follow.

We are the recipient of an illustrated radical and impious weekly, El Diablo, published in Caracas. The editor, Señor Salvador Presas, evidently not alone is aware of the fraud and injustice which prevail in Venezuela but possesses courage enough to proclaim them. Judging from one of the illustrations, it seems that in our sister republic the Roman Catholic church is as greedy as she is here, and that the politicians are as desirous to appease her hunger for the world's goods. But while Venezuela and the United States are thus far alike, the latter is ahead in one particular—she has an Anthony Comstock, Venezuela has none. We are pleased to make the acquaintance of our South American contemporary.

The bishop of Eichstädt in a Lenten pastoral letter sounds the following wail: "Modern science, the terrible example, and the bad daily press hav sown the seed of these horrible evils [Freethought and Socialism] all over Europe. . . . Our country [Germany] forms no exception; through it flows the stream of unbelief founded on science. And from our high schools and academies come down the ice-cold winds which kill the religious life of the common people. . . . Not alone in college text-books, but even in literature for the home circle, which finds its way into the most Christian families, the devil of unbelief and skepticism makes his presence manifest." It is too bad. Why does not God kill the devil?

We are now able to giv the reasons of the arrest of our friend Dr. Titus Voelkel, who has fifteen prosecutions for blasphemy pending against him, which we announced in our last "Items." Early in the morning of March 5th a policeman in citizen's clothes came to the house of the doctor and told his wife that he should "as soon as possible report at the station house." The doctor did so. In the station he found an arrest order issued from Halle, and the officer in charge told him he would better go to the prosecuting attorney and judge at once. A policeman kindly showed him the way to the lock-up, where the doctor was confined. The doctor called for books and asked to be released on bail. Five days later his bail was fixed at five thousand marks, but before he could inform his friends he was taken to Halle, together with Paine's "Age of Reason," which he is busy translating into German; and on the 16th of March, after an imprisonment of twelve days, he appeared before his judges. Those gentlemen laughed and joked with one another until the witnesses appeared in the form of two clergymen. They claimed that the doctor had said several things regarding the church and the doctrin of the trinity which were very irreligious. During the time occupied by the prosecution the judges were all ears, and grave as Methodist deacons, but when Dr. Voelkel took the stand and stated that each and every statement of the two clergymen was absolutely false, and offered to prove the truth of his assertion by reputable witnesses, the judges began making fun with one another again, not paying the slightest attention to him. When ten minutes had elapsed he was cut short, sentence was pronounced—six months' imprisonment (the same as given by the police court)—and the next case was called up. Not satisfied herewith, some or another religious scamp, evidently to entail additional misery on Mr. Voelkel, started the official rumor that some other authority wanted to see the doctor on a similar case. Seven places were mentioned. The doctor was first released, when upon telegraphing at his own expense to these places it was found out that the rumor had no other foundation than the malignity and rascality of some pious individual. A prosecution like this fastens a shame on the German nation; it is an outrage of law, justice, yes, even of common decency. We send the doctor our best wishes and heartfelt sympathy, and hope that he may liv to see a new, a better, a more just era ushered in. This prosecution is a good example of what is to be expected from a union of church and state.

Rome's Power in Illinois Politics.

THE TRUTH SEEKER recently recounted the attitude of the Romish House of the Good Shepherd toward our county treasury—how this institution, on various flimsy pretexts, has implored the county board to disregard the constitution of the state, the emphatic interpretation of the sectarian clause by the supreme court itself, and has succeeded in compelling the county board to appoint committees of investigation and find out whether its school came under the prohibition. A majority of every such committee of investigation, after reading the law on the question, hav reported that the House of the Good Shepherd is a "sectarian institution." A recent committee brought in the usual report, on which there has been much wrangling, but the report was accepted.

At a board meeting called two days prior to election the question was again brought forward—a question that was thought to hav been settled—and, in spite of the constitution, the supreme court, and their own committee's report, a majority of this despicable county board, representing both parties, voted to steal this money, under the powerful political lash of Rome. Four men voted against it—General Herman Lieb, Frank A. Stauber, and Messrs. Struckman and Cool. This could yet be blocked by anyone who could afford the time, trouble, and expense. As there is no Liberal organization in Chicago worthy the name, this steal will doubtless go unchallenged.

THE PANSY.

The following editorial from the Chicago daily News of April 10th, shows that there are persons advocating the pansy for a national floral emblem and for very different reasons than hav been adduced for its acceptance by Freethinkers. If this move is successful it will be fatal to its adoption by Secularists. The article says:

Iowa, the state of ideas, comes to the front with a proposition to make the pansy our national floral emblem. An enthusiastic Iowan, Mr. Hopkins by name, has established a propaganda for the dissemination throughout the nation of two truths:

1. That this country should hav a national flower, around which sentiments of patriotism will cluster.
2. That the pansy is the proper flower for Americans.

To the first proposition there will probably be no serious objection. Anything that will cultivate patriotism, whether it be a flower, a flag, a public school or a Fourth of July oration, meets the approbation and appreciation of all true Americans. If Frenchmen revere the lily, Englishmen the rose, if Erin loves her shamrock, Scotland the thistle, and Canada the maple leaf, why may not Americans center their affections upon a national flower, a sprig, or even a leaf?

As to the second proposition—the pansy—opinions will differ. The difficulty in selecting a representativ flower for this nation will be that every section has its favorit according to climatic variations. The pansy is perhaps as universal as any, and Mr. Hopkins is right in calling it the emblem of "union, culture, and peace."

Some would prefer a more showy representativ, as the sunflower, while in the modest West there would be a large vote in favor of the daisy. In order to harmonize these differences let the World's Fair auxiliary call an American congress for the special purpose of deciding upon a national floral emblem. We are young, but we should hav everything that older nations prize, and the World's Fair year will be an appropriate time to choose the national posy.

COMSTOCK'S PROPOSED CRUSADE.

Saint Anthony must be in need of funds, as he has taken the trouble to employ so large a space in the press dispatches, which he has unquestionably promised to pay for, hoping that the highly moral quidnuncs with the money will promptly come down with the cash. Here is the screed that is being sent out from New York:

NEW YORK, April 11th.—There will shortly be put on foot in New York one of the strongest and most combined efforts ever made to suppress the sale, not only of out and out obscene books, but that mass of so-called "erotic fiction" which of late has flooded the news-stands more particularly. It seems that the worm has at last turned, and this time the fight will be such a strong one and backed by such powerful influence that I should not wonder if it resulted in completely routing the class of fiction which has for the past two years especially been an eyesore to people who stop to look over the new books on the stands.

Anthony Comstock is the prime factor in the movement, and he has been carefully laying his plans for some time past. He has first successfully secured the coöperation and influence of some of the strongest publishing houses in the business. With that accomplished, he interested the leading officers in New York political and legal circles. When these were thoroughly interested he sought some of the rich men of the town, and from them secured the necessary capital to wage the fight. I am authoritativly told that the American News Company has also promised its full indorsement and activ participation in the warfare. The plan of operations is a most careful and elaborate one, and I must say that it has been most admirably laid out. To giv the details of the proposed crusade would, of course, defeat the aim of its projectors. But I can say that the chief batteries in the modus operandi of the scheme will be turned toward the actual output of the books. The idea is to stop the mouth of the sewer so effectually that any attempt to put a suggestiv book on sale will be surrounded by so many obstacles as to make it almost impossible for copies to get into open markets. This proposed fight seems to hav more actual promis to it than any which hav heretofore been attempted, and those who will be the workers in it are hopeful for the results. Surely the crusade has with it the heartiest godspeed of every lover of good literature.

E. A. STEVENS.

The Demise of a Michigan Liberal.

It is with unfeigned sadness that I announce that the supreme sorrow whose impending coming has so long cast darkened shadows athwart my pathway has at last fallen to my lot. My venerated father, James Ruggles, died of pneumonia, on March 16, 1891, after an illness of ten days, aged eighty-eight years. He was of the seventh generation, descended from Thomas Ruggles, who came to Roxbury, Mass., from Nazig, Eng., in 1637. He emigrated to Michigan in 1835, for many years kept hotel, occupied positions of public trust, practiced law, managed his farm of four hundred acres, was an uncompromising Democrat and avowed Freethinker.

During his illness he was a patient sufferer, and would not giv up the flower of hope that blooms on the banks of the river of death, until the day before his decease. He retained his faculties and was able to recognize all his calling friends until the approach of the throes of dissolution, when his "mind's eye" caught glimpses of beautiful beings, one of whom he called his long-deceased sister, and exclaimed, "How like a dream!" These visions, however, soon vanished. The western sun looked kindly down and kissed his throbbing temples, loving friends were at his bedside ministering to every want, and so with one hand held by that of his weeping wife and the other in the embrace of his eldest son, thus bravely and peacefully, with that serenity of mind that only consciousness of a well-spent life can giv, "the grand old man" passed away as gently as the coming of the dawn. Manfully he lived; heroically he struggled with disease until, becoming fatigued with fighting the battle of life, he surrendered to the grim monster only, and philosophically died. Thus one by one our loved ones leave us, one by one good men expire, and day by day life's heroes fall.

In the loss of my father I feel that I hav parted with the best of all my friends, one whose tender solicitude for me knew no bounds and that no words of mine are adequate to express. He was a home-builder, a home-provider, and a home lover; he worshiped his family and venerated the fireside. No father could ever take a greater interest in the welfare of all his children than did he.

As in his declining years he neared the evening sunset he experienced no desire to relapse into theological fancies of his childhood, but followed Rationalism's flaming torch of intelligence, and died in the love of reason. He liked the world in which he lived and the world liked him. Gladly would he hav longer remained with us, but the inexorable inevitable decreed otherwise.

Not only his family but the village has experienced a loss as well, for an upright citizen, a venerated pioneer, an ancient landmark of the town, a veteran friend of our people and of humanity, has dropped out of our ranks. His years were golden, and he has gone forth to meet his destiny. He paid all his obligations, including the "debt of nature."

A touching memorial tribute prepared by myself was read at the funeral, and he was buried without any aid from the clergy. Many good people came to the services expecting they would be "shocked," but went away only to admire, remarking that had a minister only read the address it would hav been superbly sublime.

Solemnly, reverently we hav placed the earth over his honored bones, and over the little mound which will mark his resting-place fragrant flowers of which he was so fond will be planted that will blossom and twine their living tendrils around our hearts and keep forever green the memory of the loved one at rest in mother earth.

Through the spirit of kindliness he has written his name in human hearts, so that a good memory will be his crowning monument and a noble life his best epitaph.

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

Universality of Conscience.

Rev. Geo. S. Weaver in the "Heart of the World" says: "Every man is a character builder. There is nothing about which men talk more positivly and learnedly and sincerely than about this, of which they know so little. No Infidelity denies this, no skepticism hesitates to believe in it. Though immaterial as spirit, the Materialist has faith in it, and though bodiless and inexplicable as God, the Atheist staggers not a moment in his acceptance of it as a real thing, in its best forms worthy of every endeavor to secure and of the admiration of all good people. Invisible, unknown, immaterial, inexplicable, as it is, it compels universal belief in its reality. Nor is this a shadowy, will-o'-the-wisp thing of the imagination, but a solid reality, the substance of what we make ourselvs in the process of the mysterious life we are now living. We know that we make characters, and that our characters determin our weight, worth, usefulness, and happiness, and that they are made of the little things of our whole lives combined. There is nothing we know better than this, and no knowledge about which we are more of one mind. Here, then, is the basis of our wisdom, our moral philosophy, and our religion. Materialists, skeptics, and religionists must all stand together here, and confess the facts and forces that exist in human character. Here, all can make a confession of faith together—of faith in the power of little things to produce great results—of faith in mind as so operating as to produce character—of faith in character as the most valuable thing which it is in our power to produce."

The greatest reason for honesty is, honesty is the greatest thing in reason.

If, then, the Materialist, the skeptic, and the religionist all occupy the same conscious pedestal and come to the same conclusion in conscience, that character determins happiness, which all desire, and that it is to be had only by attention to all the little things which occur in our lives, what moral condemnation can there be in being a Materialist, skeptic, or religionist—or commendation, either—for one or the other? And if the Atheist recognizes the value of character and weighs it in the same balance as does the theologist—the scale of utility—is he not as likely to be a worthy person as any praying priest or cringing churchman whatever? And yet, on another page of Mr. Weaver's book is woven this thread: "The common sense and sentiment of mankind repudiates the Atheistic notion that human life is such a miserably mean failure that life is not worth living." Why Atheistic notion? Nowhere is our life reckoned as so miserably mean a failure as in the vaunted "word of God," which says he repented that he made man, and in the prayer-book which confesses, "Miserable sinners are we all." The theologist bemeans man to magnify deity: the Atheist discards God to magnify manhood. It is the religionist who calls the world a vale of tears and is in a strait to depart this life, whilst the Atheist wants to liv as long as he can in the only world he is sure of for himself. In the Milwaukee, Wis., Unitarian Sunday-school, in 1884, Mr. Weaver congratulated me on being one of the very few who had principle enough to be an Atheist. Most men, said he, are obliged to rely on belief in some personal authority.

Tyngsboro, Mass. JOHN P. GUILD.

The Alderman on the Drunkard.

Many reformatory ideas start into being suggested and encouraged by your Liberal sheet, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our venerable weekly junto, the Progressiv Pilgrims, of Brooklyn, freely allow each member to express his own thoughts; hence we hav at times some queer radical remarks.

"Gentlemen," said Ex-Alderman Brick, "I hav some remarks I should like to make. I hav witnessed several attempts to reform confirmed drunkards, but, alas! hav never seen one successful. I am assured it never will be until beastly drunkenness is rated as a crime; whereas now it is ranked as only a funny 'lark,' as something to be smiled over.

"Until it is held as a crime the beating and thrashing of wives, the demolishing of household chattels at home, the maiming and cruelty to children, and the jabbing of penknives, etc., will be considered only as a funny exuberance or something to be smiled over.

"Gentlemen, one who starts out on a habitual drunk, what is it but predetermined insanity? And his extravagance, be it murder, rowdyism, or pilfering, etc., while in this state, is softened by his acquaintances with a sly wink, and saying, 'Oh, well, he was only drunk.' I repeat," continued Ex-Alderman Brick, somewhat warming up, "I may seem somewhat Utopian, but I assert that until the habit of drunkenness is held as a crime little advance can be made toward its suppression. To the confirmed drunkard imprisonment of a few months or a year in a county prison, although somewhat irksome, carries with it little recollection of punishment. What then? It must be conceded there is a point in human nature where the sense of degradation ceases, and man or woman becomes insensible to shame, and nothing is left but the physical carcass to appeal to. Now, gentlemen, I propose a remedy. When, as now, the culprit is arraigned for his crime of drunkenness and has clearly been proven guilty, he should be imprisoned, as now, one or two months or a year in some county lock-up—but mark, before his incarceration the culprit should be publicly whipped with a rawhide on his bare back and shoulders by some minor criminal; for the first offense say fifteen lashes, doubling the whipping at every repetition of the crime—a something he will recollect and dread!"

The ex-alderman resumed his seat convinced he had made an impression, which was quite evident; several members shrugging their shoulders and mutely leaving the hall. One stolid-looking old Quaker member, by the name of Baker, arose and made a few remarks in reply. "I fear, Friend Brick, thee has but hastily considered the immensity of the obstructions now before us, which will require removal before thee can establish thy whipping post. I fear thee forgets this is thought to be an age of refinement. Witness one thousand and one untaxed churches with their hireling priests; verifying the saying, 'the nearer the church the farther from God!' Alderman, has thee thought of this? These hireling priests are a greatly privileged class. They hav ever been exempted from military and jury duty, but ever ready for a chaplaincy."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE New Orleans Delta says that J. E. Remsburg delivered "a most interesting lecture" in that city.

DR. H. SOLTAROFF, of New York, will lecture before the Newark Liberal League on Sunday, April 26, 1891. Subject: "Is Society an Organism?"

W. F. JAMIESON has just filled lecture engagements in Des Arc and Rogers, Ark.; Joplin, Mo.; Neodesha, Kan. He is announced for several weeks ahead every evening, with two exceptions.

ON Sunday, April 26th, Mr. Charlesworth will lecture before the Newark Secular Union on "The Life and Career of Charles Bradlaugh," at 3 P.M. At the close of the lecture a collection will be made, the proceeds to be forwarded to London, Eng., to assist in the erection of a memorial institute in honor of Mr. Bradlaugh's memory. Mr. Charlesworth wishes us to state that he has found it impossible to enter upon his intended lecturing tour as arranged, owing to serious complications arising in the trades organization to which he belongs. New York city has just barely escaped a crisis in the building trades, which threatened to involve upward of fifty thousand human beings in want, strikes being imminent owing to an internecine quarrel among the bricklayers' trades unions. Happily the trouble is averted, and Mr. Charlesworth has now found himself the president of a local union. Friends are notified that he will take up the tour about the beginning of October. In the mean time he will be pleased to make arrangements for lectures about that date. Address, 505 East 83d street, New York city.

WE rejoice in the widening thought that marks this age of ours, in the broadening and sweetening sympathy that extends itself further and further where grace and compassion are needed; in the increasing fortitude and courage, in the growing determination to hold evil at bay and compel the world to giv up its long-hidden secrets of knowledge and beneficence. We rejoice in all the spread of truth, in the deepening love of liberty, in the higher respect for order and harmony and peace, and in that grand vision of a nobler and better time coming that floods with light all higher spirits and touches with its beams of radiance even the dark and stubborn ground where poverty and misery hav their abode.—Frothingham.

WHEN it is no longer practicable to punish heresy as a crime, men hav practically abandoned the orthodox theory of revelation. Religious persecution belongs to the spirit of past ages, and has been gradually dying out as that spirit has been informed and changed; but it is the proper fruit and action of theology and belief in a fixed, infallible revelation. Believers are now tolerant because the perfect, fervent, compelling faith of the past is no longer possible. They ought, logically, to persecute as fiercely as of yore; but, unconsciously molded by the spirit of the age, it is no longer in them to do so.—N. R. Waters.

THE secret of genius is to suffer no fiction to exist —to demand, in all things, good faith, reality, and a purpose; and, first, last, midst, and without end, to honor every truth by use.—Goethe.

ALL of us who are worth anything spend our manhood in unlearning the follies or in expiating the mistakes of our youth.—Percy B. Shelley.

The Crescent City Tragedy.

Suppose Superintendent Murray had been ambushed and assassinated by a secret league of cut-throats because in the execution of his duty he was trying to the best of his ability to elevate American law and order above the reign of organized criminal conspiracy. And suppose further that New York, confident in the strength and purity of its courts of justice, had restrained its avenging hand, had given the assassins a fair and impartial trial, and after hearing the evidence which tended to confirm and prove the existence of this organized band of alien murderers, had seen its mercy, justice, and forbearance laughed at, had had its great patience and magnanimity insulted with a verdict which scorned and stultified justice, made a jest of law and order, murdered reason, and handed over our fair city to the tender mercies and gentle passions of a coterie of cut-throats, every member of which had a price on his head, and a halter around his neck—suppose all this, if you can, and you will hav an accurate picture of the state of affairs in New Orleans on the morning of March 14th this present year of grace. Suppose this had happened in New York, would the citizens of New York hav remained passiv, still, and silent, satisfied to hav their laws nullified and to let justice lie dead, killed by the steel and silver of a league of assassination? I know if I had been in New Orleans that day, and had possessed sufficient physical courage, I would certainly hav slung a musket over my shoulder and followed Parkerson's lead. Nobody regrets more than I that this stain has soiled and spotted the American escutcheon, and it does not lessen my regret to know that it could easily hav been prevented at Castle Garden. But sniveling over spilt milk has never yet done any good; and as the stain is still there, the best and wisest thing to do is to blot it out as soon as possible. But on second thought it hardly seems to be much of a stain, and what there is of it is on the cowardly and corrupt jury more than anything else. If the jury had done their duty as they were sworn to do, the more or less lamentable occurrence would never hav happened. It seems to me that the citizens of New Orleans simply did what their unfaithful representativs in the jury-box should hav done—dealt out even-handed justice to a mob of bloody-handed murderers. In this country the people are generally acknowledged to be the sovereigns; and no government or court or jury is above or superior to the people; and when the people's representativs prove recreant to their trust or fail to do their duty, the people are fully justified in protecting themselvs. You cannot with fairness condemn the citizens of New Orleans, when, seeing that their courts were useless, and their laws weak and powerless, they took summary action, and calling in the impartial and efficient aid of that grim and incorruptible magistrate, Judge Lynch, showed to the world that murder would not go unpunished nor assassination unwhipped of justice, even though the ordinary and more orderly rules of law had to be violated. There is one result of this occurrence that has not attracted the attention it deserves. From nearly every part of the country—certainly from every part where there was an Italian colony or population—American citizens, who were born in Italy, hav held meetings and passed resolutions denouncing the government of the United States and appealing frantically to the Italian government for redress and vengeance. Their heated references to the power of Italy's navy and treasonable communications to Italy's minister of foreign affairs certainly prove them to be exceedingly poor American citizens. Why do they appeal to a king whom they hav repudiated? Hav they no pride or confidence in their own government? If they hav, why do they ask assistance from a foreign state? If they hav not, why do they remain in this country? If this navy of which they so exultingly boast should advance upon America with hostil intentions, what action would these citizens take? Would they espouse the cause of their adopted country, or would loyal Americans find themselvs confronted by a hostil army encamped on American soil—an army which had not crossed the Atlantic in transports, but in the steerage of immigrant vessels? This exhibition of treason can hardly be called an outburst of patriotism or loyalty to American institutions. It showed very plainly that the Italian residents propose to get all they can out of this country and giv in return nothing but abuse and treason. It is not putting the case one iota too strongly to say that nine out of every ten Italian immigrants are a curse and a pest to this country.

The Italian immigration of to-day, like that of the Hungarian and Polish, is very largely composed of paupers, criminals, and people of such weak mental capacity as to be but a trifle better than idiots. The majority of them can neither read nor write. They huddle together in quarters filthy and foul beyond the power of decent language to describe, work for less money than other and better-bred workers find necessary to liv, or rather exist, on, and are a constant menace to the health of the communities they curse by their presence. They commit numerous deeds of violence, and in proportion to their numbers giv the police more trouble than any other of our foreign residents.

This picture is not in the least overdrawn. It is most cheerfully admitted that some Italians make good and law-abiding citizens, but a large majority of them are, by reason of their ignorance, their customs, their slavish allegiance to the pope or King Humbert, and, above all, their propensity to deeds of crime and violence, unfitted to liv in a country of the character of the United States.

I am aware that the utterance of such sentiments is deprecated and denounced, called Knownothingism and un-American bigotry. Humane, but badly mistaken men declare that it is unkind and, oh horrors! un-American to try to stop or stem the tide of immigration; that this is the land of the free, and a city of refuge for the oppressed, and everybody should be made welcome and invited to share our national hospitality and hearthstone. The day for such Utopian sentiment has passed by and we should know by this time that this is the land of the oppressor as well as the oppressed.

It is conceded, I take it, that in a republic the ballot is the true and proper remedy for existing evils. But if we put the ballot, that most potent weapon, into the hands of the unlettered and ignorant hordes who know nothing of our systems or institutions, and care almost infinitly less, who regard election time as the heaven-inspired day in which they can make a couple of dollars in a couple of minutes—if, I say, we put the ballot into the hands of such people, we giv them a sword with which they will eventually assassinate the republic.

Taking an oath of allegiance to the United States is not all that is required to make a good citizen. A European slave or serf cannot be made an American freeman in a day, courts, naturalization bureaus, laws, and pot-house politicians to the contrary notwithstanding. Where ignorance and illiteracy exist citizenship is a mockery, and to put the ballot in the hands of those who do not know how to use it, is as suicidal as to giv a dagger to a man possessed of an acute homicidal mania.

So long as this tide of unrestricted immigration is allowed to sweep in and debase, dilute, and defile the stream of American citizenship, so long will the great republic be retarded in its great onward march of progress. If the gates of Castle Garden are not closed or the lines between good and bad immigration more closely drawn, it will be but a comparativly short time when this country will be Europeanized.

Some of the American societies demand that we oblige the foreigner to liv here twenty-one years before granting him the privilege of citizen. I confess I do not see much good in that plan, and even admitting that it was efficacious, it should not be forgotten that these people are not required simply to work; it is but common justice that they should bear a fair share of the burdens of citizenship, and should know what it means and the duties and responsibilities it entails. For my part, I freely admit that I would like to see all immigration stopped, for a time at least. We hav imported enough and it would be a national blessing if the importation ceased.

This I suppose is almost out of the question, and the next best plan, in my judgment, would be something of this nature: Let all intending immigrants file a declaration of their intention to come to this country with the American consul nearest to their homes, say, not less than two years previous to the date of their departure. It should be made a part of the consul's duties to thoroughly investigate the character of the intending immigrant, his financial condition, and require such other information as may be deemed necessary and desirable. If the examination is satisfactory to the consul he should be required to giv the intending immigrant a certificate stating the bearer was a fit person to become a resident of the United States.

It would be well to hav the certificate state that the bearer was not afflicted with any contagious or incurable disease. As the consul would hav no interest or concern in preventing the intending immigrant from trying to better his condition there would be no trouble in getting his signature if the intending immigrant was worthy and deserving of it. This plan would do away with the constant friction between the steamship companies and the United States emigration commissioners. It would also tend to make it easier to place the responsibility for bad immigration, and if the consuls were held to a strict accountability the bad or undesirable immigration would practically cease. When the immigrant lands make him thoroughly understand that if in five years he is not able to read the organic law of his adopted country, the Constitution of the United States, he will be shipped back to the country from whence he came. But important as the question of citizenship is, it is not the only question involved in the immigration problem. During President Arthur's administration we found it necessary and desirable to keep out the hordes of Mongolians which threatened to overwhelm us. John was not particularly vicious or depraved, obeyed the laws, and in some few respects was a good kind of immigrant. But because we believed he interfered with the right of the American laborer to earn his living we excluded him, and for that reason if for no other we ought to say to the people of all other foreign nations, "You are not wanted, and will not be received, so long as our social conditions are such that your presence will inflict additional hardships on our people, nativ-born and naturalized, citizen and alien. The corrupt and selfish politicians of both the great parties know full well the dangerous and utterly unfit character of much of our immigration, but they make no sound. They might lose the votes of the Pope's paddies or dagos if they did. And some of our otherwise admirable German-born citizens might withhold the German-American vote. When, however, the present wretched and utterly insufficient means of protecting ourselvs from a foreign invasion—which is none the less dangerous because it is apparently peaceful—hav brought our country to the verge of national annihilation, there will go forth such a stentorian cry for laws for our self-preservation that party lines will be wiped out, patriotism will take the place of partisanship, the paltering cry of the vote-seeking demagog will be silenced, the voice of alien traitors will be hushed, and America, invincible America, will rise in the majestic might of her too sorely tried and outraged patience, and all good and loyal Americans, regardless of creed or race, will unite shoulder to shoulder to save and perpetuate the American nation as they united thirty years ago to-day to save and perpetuate the American Union. A Short Anti-Prohibition Sermon.

From four columns of tirade against anti-Prohibitionists in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 28th I extract the following passage as a text:

> The Anarchist opposes prohibition and hates it, because of the abuses and extremes to which religion or churches are trying to carry it in their own interest by prohibiting Sunday work and Sunday amusement, and suspending all public and private activity on their so-called holy day. The hearts of these pious zealots are right, yet their heads are wrong.

Mr. Editor, and brother truth seekers, I hav been a Prohibitionist, and before I was a Prohibitionist I was a Presbyterian. I evoluted out of the latter long ago, and out of the former not so very long ago.

Had I read the "Age of Reason" before joining the church I am quite sure I should never hav been a church member. And the second paragraph in Paine's "Common Sense" constrains me to become an anti-Prohibitionist. I quote the beginning of the second paragraph:

> Society in every state is a blessing, but government, even in its best estate, is but a necessary evil, in its worst state an intolerable one; for when we suffer, or are exposed to the same miseries by a government, which we might expect without a government, our calamity is hightened by reflecting that we furnish the means by which we suffer. Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence; the palaces of kings are built upon the ruins of the bowers of paradise.

When Paine came to America he found the colonies in what might be called a state of paralyzed anarchy. This is forcibly described in the Declaration of Independence. And yet, in a vast extent of country, where there were few that might be called wealthy, there was very little abject poverty.

It was a fundamental doctrin of the old Republican party, founded by Paine and Jefferson, that "The world is governed too much," and that "That government is best which governs least."

Consequently the cost of government in America was at the outset very small. Paine in his "Rights of Man" says:

> The whole expense of the federal government of America, founded, as I hav said, on the system of representation, and extending over a country nearly ten times as large as England, is but $600,000.

That sum divided by four million inhabitants, would be only fifteen cents per capita.

Further on Paine compares the expenses of the English government with those of America. Every person in England, says he, male and female, pays on an average in taxes two pounds eleven shillings and sixpence—nearly twelve dollars—while the average of taxes in America, including the cost of state governments, is only a dollar and a quarter.

If these calculations were correct is not the change in one hundred years appalling? The present cost of our federal government alone is $8 per capita—more than fifty times greater than in 1791. And one quarter of this $8 per capita tax is paid for pensions. This per capita burden for pensions alone exceeds the whole cost of government, national and state, a hundred years ago.

Mr. Editor, and fellow truth seekers, I am not an Anarchist. But if we were transported to Russia how would we be likely to stand on the question of government? My opinion is that those of us who would not become at once avowed Anarchists, would become hypocrits lest we might hav to undergo a further transportation by order of that paternal government. The True Story of Jonah.

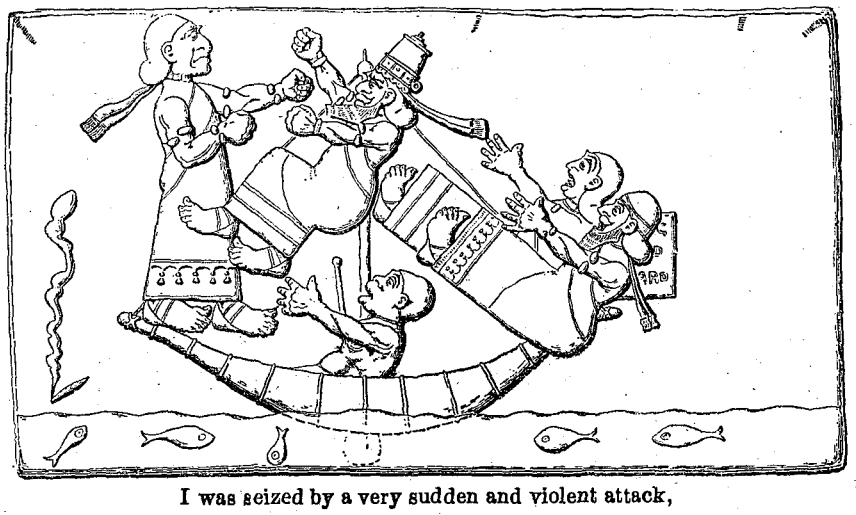
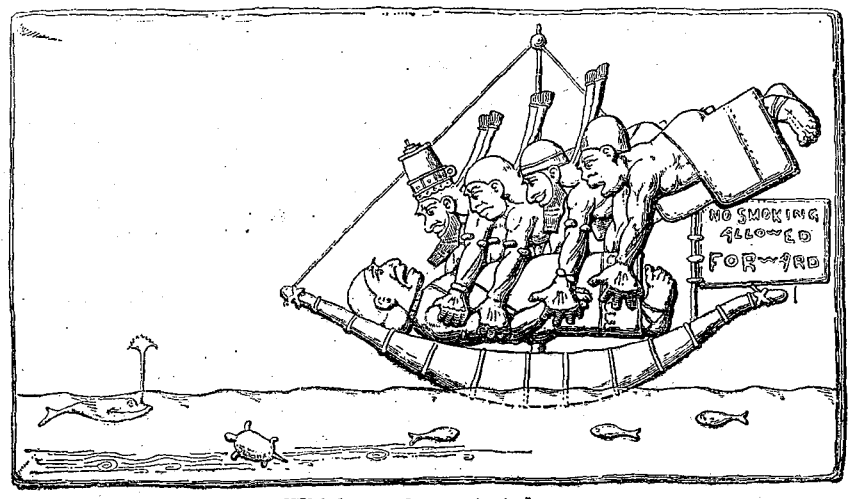
THE EARLIEST PATENT MEDICIN TESTIMONIAL KNOWN, FOUND AMONG THE SOULPTURES OF ASSYRIA.

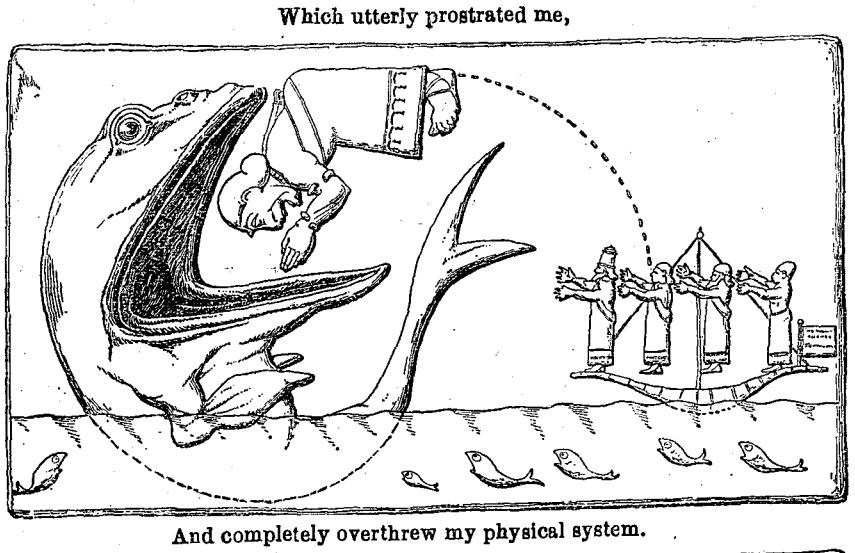


Drs. Melcisadech & Ptorath:

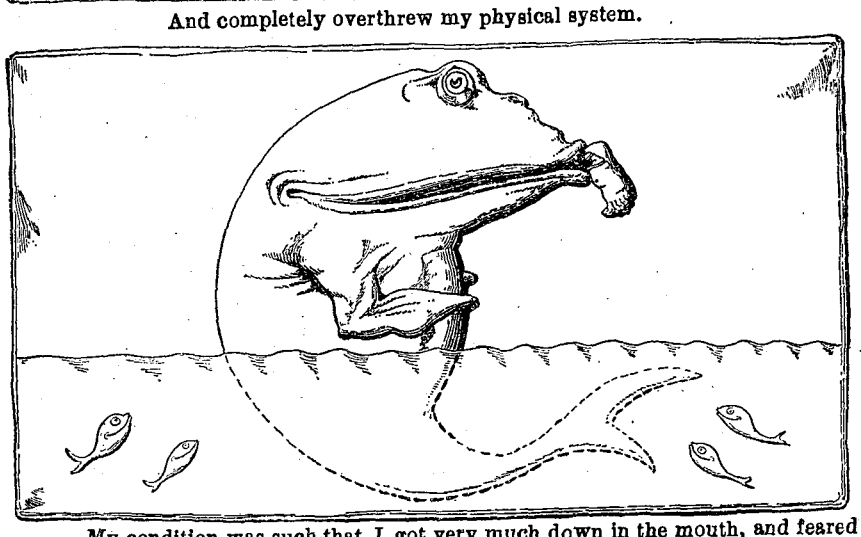


No. 1001 Smith St., Tarshish.

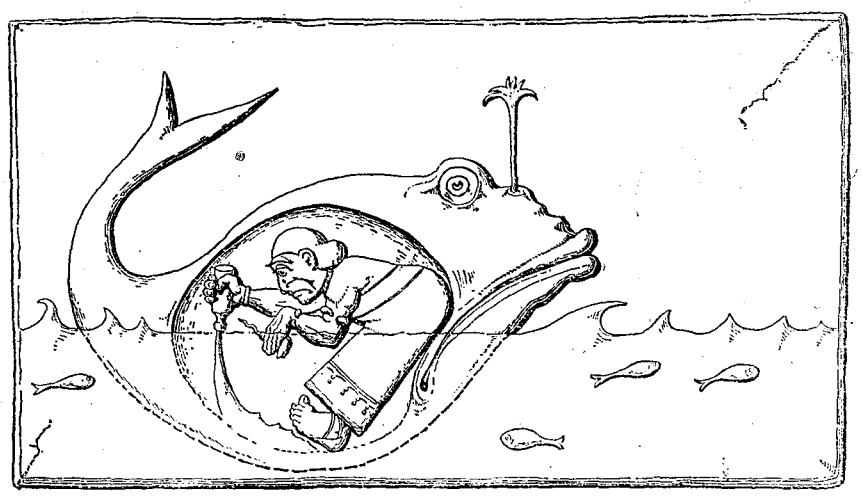
Dear Sirs:



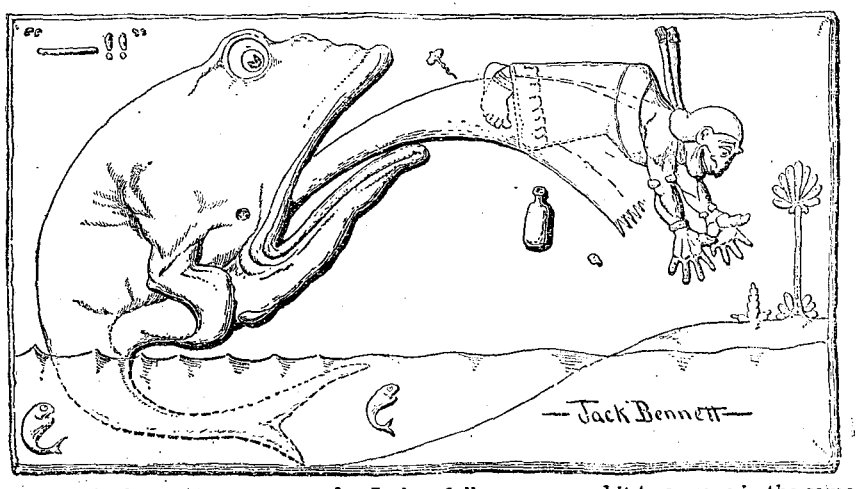
While coming from Tarshish to this city recently, by water,



I was seized by a very sudden and violent attack,



Which utterly prostrated me,



And completely overthrew my physical system.

My condition was such that I got very much down in the mouth, and feared that I should never see home and friends again.

But I used one bottle of your celebrated Gourd Vine Elixir,

And was at once restored. I cheerfully recommend it to anyone in the same condition.

Very sincerely,

JONAH,

Salvation's Scheme.

Salvation's scheme,
Based on a dream,
A holy Bible story,
This you believe
And you'll receive
A harp and crown of glory.

But if you fail,
You'll weep and wail,
And gnash your teeth in anguish;
While ages roll
Your naked soul
In sheol's flame must languish.

THE SCHEME.

In Palestine,
Where grows the vine,
There lived a Jewish beauty,
A virgin pure,
Of this we're sure;
She always did her duty.

A God she gave
A world to save
To nature's law or passion.
Love ruled the day,
And had its way
Regardless of the fashion.

The boy she had Looked always sad,
But grew by good behavior
To man's estate,
But met sad fate
And thus became a savior.

A half-man God
Seems rather odd,
But all the world hav praised him;
It may be wise
For sacrifice,
Since for that end they raised him.

By him alone
We could atone
For Mother Eve's transgression;
Lured by a brute
She stole God's fruit—
That talking snake's suggestion.

God said, "You'll die
The day you try
Your teeth upon my peaches."
The serpent said,
"You'll not go dead,
But become wise as he is."

Now, to be wise
Was, in their eyes,
The very thing they needed;
They'd just been made
Full grown, 'tis said,
So they God's serpent heeded.

The fruit so fair
Hung high in air;
She tiptoed tall and took them.
She gave her mate
And they both ate
Till appetite forsook them.

With wondering eyes
In great surprise
They saw that they were naked,
Then made a rush
For fig-leaf brush,
The serpent overtakèd.

In deepest shade
They aprons made
Of fig leaves sown together,
So bright and green,
And neat and clean,
Just fine for summer weather.

Next morning cool,
God called his school:
"Ho! Adam, where art thou?"
"I shamed to find
My form like thine."
"Me, too," says Eve. "So now!"

"You've stole my fruit!
Taught by that brute,
You're now as wise as me.
I'll turn you out,
And guard the route,
To save that other tree."

His awful loss
Made him so cross
He went about a-cursing,
And ever since
That great offense
He's been his wrath a-nursing.

He cursed the snake
And earth for sake
Of Adam and his wife,
Then made a place
For all their race—
A hell for endless life.

To sweat and toil,
And till the soil
The man he made a sinner—
Through brambles, thick
With thorns that prick,
"To chase a snake for dinner."

Of all the cursed
Eve fared the worst.
A slave to man he made her—
Sorrow and pain
When joy should reign,
And motherhood degrade her.

He turned them out
To roam about
'Mong thistles, thorns, and brambles;
In horrid suits
Of skins of brutes,
To take their homeless rambles.

MORAL.

A lie's a lie,
You can't deny,
No matter who's the teller;
The truth will stand
For God or man,
Or even the other feller.

A God I'd own
Would not atone
For Mother Eve's transgression
By suicide,
Nor yet provide
A hell for indiscretion.

The Pedigree of Jesus.

Mr. P. B. Reasoner, an esteemed subscriber, desires light on the following assertions of Mr. C. T. Russell, editor of Zion's Watch Tower. Mr. Russell, by letters and papers, hopes to convert Mr. Reasoner, and this is the way he explains a scriptural difficulty:

"Yours, with reference to the genealogy of Christ, is at hand. In reply: Matthew and Luke giv two totally distinct genealogical lines. Matthew givs the line of Joseph, and Luke givs the line of Mary. According to Jewish custom, a wife was adopted into the tribal family of her husband, and had all the appertaining rights. It is a mistake to suppose that Mary was of the tribe of Levi as you suggest. Her genealogy is traced in Luke to the family of David, of the tribe of Judah. Instead of saying, as we do nowadays, that Joseph was the son-in-law of Heli, it is said that Joseph was the son of Heli, Heli being the name of Mary's father. The fact that the number of generations of the two families are different counts nothing. The same is true of many families to-day."

This "explanation" was first made, we believe, by Augustine, and has been adopted by some Protestant commentators. But no weight can be attached to it, for the reason that other commentators and writers, equally distinguished, reject it.

The assumption that Luke givs the pedigree of Mary and not of Joseph possesses no scriptural authority, for Luke mentions Joseph and not Mary, and Greek grammarians assure us that no possible rendering of the Greek will stand that construction. Luke (i, 27, and ii, 4) declares Joseph to be of the house of David, while he nowhere says the same of Mary, or that she was the daughter of Heli. According to the epistles of James, or the Protevangelion (an apocryphal book), Mary's father was Joachim, who, as the commentators who use this "argument" assure us, was identical with Heli. This is not so, and even if it were, it would not reconcile Matthew and Luke, for they both assert that they are giving the genealogy of Joseph. And if Christ's own words are of any weight, he did not believe himself to be of the house of David (see Matthew xxii, 41–46; Mark xii, 35–37; Luke xx, 41–44). The people who listened to Jesus, and those who wrote the gospels, believed Christ to be the carpenter's son, and according to the last three references cited, neither his father nor mother was believed to be of Davidical lineage (see Matthew xiii, 55; Mark vi, 3; Luke iv, 22; John vi, 42). It may be noted, in passing, that about the only point upon which the "evangelists" agree is that Jesus and his parents were not of royal blood.

The "argument" that Mary was the daughter of Heli instead of Joseph being his son can be admitted only by impeaching the veracity of Luke—precisely what the editor of Zion's Watch Tower is endeavoring not to do—establishing the identity of Heli and Joachim; and making canonical the apocryphal Protevangelion. Now, it is easy enough to impeach the veracity of Luke (Matthew alone does it), but it can not be established by any sufficient authority that Joachim was Heli, or that Mary was Heli's daughter. If the words "son of" in italics in Luke signify son-in-law, then Adam was, according to that theory, the son-in-law of God, which is nonsense. It is unreasonable to believe that "son-in-law" was meant to be expressed in each case from Christ to Jehovah, and there is no excuse for discriminating in the case of Joseph and Heli. Another point against the supposition that Mary was of royal blood is that she was a cousin of Elizabeth, whose husband was distinctly declared to be of the house of David, but nowhere is the claim made for either Mary or Elizabeth.

A slight comparison of Matthew and Luke made by Lord Amberley in his "Life of Jesus" (a chapter from "Analysis of Religious Belief," one of the best works ever published) will be pertinent here. After giving in parallel columns the genealogies as recorded by the only two evangelists who pretended to know how Jesus came to be born, Lord Amberley says:

"Various observations offer themselvs on these discrepant genealogies. In the first place it will be observed that Matthew, in his anxiety to show that the whole period comprised is divisible into three equal parts of fourteen generations each, has actually omitted no less than four generations contained in the authorities he followed. For since he traced the descent of Joseph through the royal line of Judah, we are enabled to check his statements by reference to the book of Chronicles (1 Chron. iii), and thus to convict him of positiv bad faith. In the first instance he omits three kings, representing Uzziah as the son of Joram, who was his great-great-grandfather; in the second he passes over Jehoiachim, making Jehoiachin the son instead of the grandson of Josiah. In the third period we hav no authority by which to verify his statements beyond Zerubbabel, but his determination to carry out his numerical system at all hazards is shown by the double reckoning of Jehoiachin, at the close of the second and the beginning of the third division. The latter has in fact but thirteen generations, and it was only by this trick—a little concealed by the break effected through his allusion to the captivity—that the appearance of uniformity was maintained. Luke has adopted a different method. Leaving the line of kings, he connects Joseph with David through Nathan instead of Solomon. Now, beyond the fact that Nathan was the offspring of David and Bathsheba, nothing whatever is known about him. Indeed it may hav been his very obscurity, and the consequent facility of creating descendants for him, that led to his selection in preference to Solomon, though unless it were that his name stood next above Solomon's (2 Sam. v, 14)—there is no obvious reason for his being preferred to several other children of David. However, he answered the purpose as well as any, and after him it was not a difficult operation to invent a plausible list of names to fill up the gap between him and Joseph. The compiler of the list in Matthew had the advantage in so far that he did not require to draw on his imagination except for nine names between Zerubbabel and Joseph, while the compiler of the list in Luke had to supply the whole period from Nathan downwards with forefathers. But the second compiler had the advantage over the first inasmuch as his fraud did not admit of the same easy exposure by reference to its sources, and it was, on the whole, a safer course to desert history altogether than to falsify it in favor of an arithmetical fancy.

"Another discrepancy between the two writers remains to be noted; it is the enormous disproportion in the number of generations between David and Joseph. Matthew has twenty-five generations, and Luke forty, excluding Joseph himself. A difference of this magnitude—involving something like 400–450 years—is not to be surmounted by any process of harmonizing. To which it may be added that the two evangelists, by assigning to Joseph different fathers, clearly inform us that his true father was unknown."

To this we may add the statement of Scott ("Life of Christ," p. 20):

"Paul lays great stress on the circumstance that the promis given to Abraham was made, not to his seed, as of Mary, but to his 'seed which is Christ.' To whatever passages in the Psalms or elsewhere Peter may be supposed to refer, to the Jews unquestionably the words meant, what they appear to mean. That such anticipations could be fulfilled by a prenatural birth, without any known father, from a virgin of whose Davidic descent there is the slenderest possible evidence, or rather no evidence at all, is a conclusion which can be acceptable to those only who believe in alleged historical narrativs on no other grounds than that they wish them to be true, and dare not call them in question."

And Dr. John McNaught, incumbent of St. Chrysostom's church, Everton, Liverpool, says of this "explanation:"

"On the first glance these genealogies, as given by Matthew and Luke, are so evidently different that it has been the ordinary, if not invariable, practice of Christian harmonists and commentators to represent the former evangelist as recording the descent of Joseph, while the latter evangelist is said to hav given the pedigree of Mary. We will say nothing of the plausibility of this explanation, which acknowledges the genealogies to be wholly different, and supposes they belong to two persons. Our questions must rather affect the truthfulness of this mode of explaining away the difficulty. Let the reader bear in mind how Matthew states that 'Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary,' and how Luke's words are, 'Joseph which was the son of Heli,' and then let the reader say whether it is truthful to allege that these different genealogies belong to different individuals. Is it not plain that each of them professes to trace the lineal descent of one and the same man, Joseph? If we are still to be told that when Matthew professes to giv the descent of Joseph, he is to be understood as giving the descent of Mary, then we simply rejoin that such an explanation is nothing more or less than an abandonment of the idea of inspirational infallibility; for it represents the Bible as saying one thing and meaning another."

Greg's "Creed of Christendom" says of the discrepant genealogies:

"One critic supposes that one evangelist givs the pedigree of the adoptiv, the other of the real father of Joseph. Another assumes that one is the genealogy of Joseph, and the other that of Mary—a most convenient idea, but entirely gratuitous, and positivly contradicted by the language of the text" (p. 172).

Another writer says:

"The genealogy of Jesus in the canonical gospels . . . is traced solely through Joseph, who alone is stated to be of the lineage of David. The genealogies of Matthew and Luke, though differing in several important points, at least agree in excluding Mary" (Supernatural Religion, p. 259).

Scott says further:

"Both the evangelists profess to giv the genealogy of Joseph; while neither of them gives any support to the Davidic descent of Mary," and "the pointed expression that Joseph went with Mary to Bethlehem 'because he was [not, they were] of the house and lineage of David' (Luke ii, 4), seems to exclude the idea" (English Life of Jesus, p. 26).

We may therefore dismiss this "explanation" as of no avail, and the remarks based thereon, for the following reasons:

1. There is no scriptural authority for it.
2. Mary was not the daughter of Heli.
3. If "son of" meant "son-in-law," and Luke iii, 23, ought to read; "And Jesus himself, being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, which was the son-in-law of Heli," then Heli would be "son-in-law of Matthat, which was the son-in-law of Levi," and so on to the end of the genealogy. Try to follow the pedigree back by this method and see where you will land.
4. Where the writer speaks of Elizabeth, he takes pains to say her husband was of the house of David; but nowhere says the same of her or of Mary.
5. There is no authority for saying Joachim and Heli were identical; and
6. If they were it would make no difference, for, according to the Protevangelion, Joachim probably was the father of Mary in the same way that Joseph was the father of Jesus—by proxy of the angels. This is the substance of the story:

"Joachim, a rich man, brought offerings to the Lord. Rubim the priest told him he must do so no more because he was childless. Joachim in great grief retired to the mountains, resolved to fast and pray until he could become a father. His wife Anna knowing not what had become of him, and supposing him dead, began to bewail her childless widowhood. But soon she put off her mourning garments, and, resuming her wedding dress, took a walk in the garden. Sitting under a laurel-tree she prayed, not for a husband but for a child. Looking up she saw a sparrow's nest. 'Alas! O Lord!' she said, 'why am I not like the birds or beasts which are productiv before thee? I hav become a reproach to the sons of Israel, and they hav driven me in derision out of the temple of the Lord.'

"Just then a good angel appeared and promised to answer Anna's prayer. Presently two more angels came and told her her husband was alive and coming home, for another angel had heard Joachim's prayer, and promised an answer.

"The reunion of husband and wife was joyful. Joachim made a grand offering of goats, lambs, and calves to the priests, and in due time, reckoning no doubt from the good angel's visit in the garden, a female child was born, and they called her Mary."

Luke says Jesus was supposed to be the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli. The words "the son" are not in the "original Greek." Yet the name Joseph is in the Greek (not the original, for there is no original), and St. Augustine's hypothesis that Luke was giving the genealogy of Mary is therefore impossible to maintain. "Mary, the daughter of," could never hav been meant by "Joseph, the son of." And Kitto's "Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature" says that the legends respecting Anna, who is said to hav been Mary's mother, "are pure fables, without the slightest evidence." This is rough on the priest's authority, but is undoubtedly true. The hypothesis, therefore, that Luke givs the genealogy of Mary, is disproved by the gospel itself.

Biblical Reasons.

For unique silliness there is no one so conspicuous as a man who really believes that the Bible is worthy of credence and plenarily inspired. Some one has asked the editor of the Christian Advocate:

"How do you answer those who say that if the church forbids woman to sit in the general conference as delegate, and will not ordain her and admit her to the ministry, to be consistent it should forbid her to teach in the Sunday-school, speak for temperance, and giv her experience in class-meetings and prayer-meetings?"

But this is nothing to Dr. Buckley; he straightens up and replies: "We answer them easily from the scriptures (1 Cor. xi)." And this is the scripture he relies upon:

"4. Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoreth his head.

"5. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head, for that is even all one as if she were shaven.

"6. For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn; but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered."

The most obvious meaning to this reply is that women can teach in Sunday-school because there it is entirely proper to keep their bonnets on, while the pulpit demands an uncovered head.

The depth, learning, and logic of some theologians remind us of Goldsmith's village schoolmaster:

"In arguing, too, the parson owned his skill,
For e'en though vanquished he could argue still;
While words of learned length and thundering sound
Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around,
And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
That one small head could carry all he knew."

A New Petition for the Pardon of Mr. Heywood.

In the Boston Transcript of April 11th appeared the following:

"A petition having been circulated for the purpose of securing the pardon of Ezra H. Heywood, the following counter petition has been forwarded by the directors of the New England Watch and Ward Society to the president of the United States and to the United States district attorney of the state of Massachusetts:

"'The directors of the New England Watch and Ward Society, formerly the New England Society for the Suppression of Vice, are extremely reluctant to oppose the well-meant and kindly intended efforts for the release of Ezra H. Heywood from prison.

"'They are sure, however, that no one can intelligently or justly urge Mr. Heywood's pardon who has seen the vile, obscene, and disgusting language and ideas for publishing and circulating which he was sentenced. We hav yet to know of any person of respectability who, on being confronted with the actual language used by this man, has not experienced a revulsion of feeling and withdrawn the advocacy for his release.

"'Our society, moreover, would itself add its influence to this petition for his forgivness upon his promis not to repeat his crime. As long, however, as his utterances and publications are too unspeakably vile to be printed, and he declares his purpose of continuing his offense if set free, we must earnestly demand that so infatuated an offender should serve out the entire term for which he was committed.'"

Considering the statements made by this Boston branch of Comstock's vice society, knowing that its influence with the president is greater than the influence of any Freethinker, sincerely desirous of ascertaining just what standard is to be used to measure literature, and being earnest also in asking for the remission of the penalty inflicted upon Mr. Heywood, some of the friends of his friends hav prepared the subjoined petition, and ask the Liberals of the country to cut it out, paste it upon proper-sized paper, get it signed, and return it to E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York city:

"PETITION FOR THE PARDON OF EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

"WHEREAS, the New England Watch and Ward Society, formerly known by the name of the New England Society for the Suppression of Vice, is reported by the Boston Transcript, in its issue of April 11, 1891, to have expressed a willingness to add its influence for the release of Mr. Heywood, who is now serving a term of two years' imprisonment in Charleston prison, in the state of Massachusetts, provided he will promise not to further use, in the discussion of the sex problem, certain words or expressions alleged to be indecent, and

"WHEREAS, he might be disposed to use certain other words or phrases sanctioned by Holy Writ, and which might in future involve him in further trouble;

"Now, we the undersigned, while not wishing by this action to be considered apologists for Mr. Heywood in the use of the terms for which he has been condemned, hereby pledge ourselves that we will, in case he be restored to his afflicted family, through a pardon of the President of the United States, discountenance the employment by him of any words or phrases which may not be found in a book standard in all Christian families, entitled

"And we, the signers of this petition, do hereby protest that it is a glaring inconsistency, a hollow mockery, and a gross outrage for those who hold to the language and teachings of the aforementioned book, to imprison editors and publishers for sending through the United States mails papers and books which, in their most offensive expressions, are fully within the limits of decency, judged by the criterion established by said book, issued and freely mailed by the Bible Society, and upheld by the postmaster-general of the United States, and the other societies which take an antagonistic attitude in opposition to the pardon of Mr. Heywood.

"We therefore unite with the friends of the imprisoned editor in the petition for pardon on the conditions hereinbefore stated, in view of the fact that Mr. Heywood has already suffered imprisonment for more than eight months for the offense for which he has been incarcerated. Respectfully submitted to the president, the department of justice, and the postmaster-general for their impartial, considerate, and immediate action."

If the vice society which procured Mr. Heywood's imprisonment is now really desirous of repairing the injustice done him, the members must feel satisfied with this petition and can hav no possible reason for refusing to sign it. Mr. Heywood's family is in great distress, some of them being ill, and he should be restored to them without delay. We trust therefore that the "Watch and Ward" Society will coöperate with the Liberals in procuring his pardon. Let the petitions be numerously signed at once, so that when President Harrison returns from his Johnsonian task of swinging around the circle his attention can be asked to them.

Suppressing Eroticism.

That is quite an interesting item which E. A. Stevens sends from Chicago about an attempt on the part of Anthony Comstock to suppress the sale in this city of all books of an erotic or "broad" character, such as translations of novels by Maupassant, Zola, Gautier, and others, and some by our own writers, like Edgar Saltus, Amelie Rives, and a half dozen other sensational writers for cash. There is nothing so satisfactory as going a long way from home to hear entertaining news.

The statement that some big publishing firms hav promised to coöperate with Anthony, that politicians will lend him countenance, and that wealthy merchants donate cash, suggests a thought. Has the big publishing firm between Third and Fourth avenues, Astor place and Ninth street, volunteered to coöperate? Hav the clerical politicians ensconced in the building offered the loan of their countenances? Hav the wealthy people who belong to the firm put up any cash? Is Comstock ready to proceed?

If the replies to these queries be favorable we desire to point out a book which offers a promising beginning. The output of the volume is large; it is sold, given away, and offered as premiums to religious journals, in such numbers that we doubt if there is a man, woman, or child in the country who has not heard of it. It is found in railroad cars, hotels, on steamboats, and extracts from it are scattered from innumerable street corners.

The book is published by the big firm between Fourth and Third avenues, Astor place and Ninth street, and the name of the firm is on the title-page of the book, at the bottom, as follows:

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY,

Nearly three months ago we called the attention of Postmaster-General Wanamaker to this work, asking for a decision as to its mailability, under the ruling which closed the mailbags to that irrational book named "Kruetzer Sonata." We believe the work which we asked Mr. Wanamaker to consider to be more irrational than the other; and under his definition of unmailable matter we suspected that the work called the Holy Bible might be rejected by his department. Up to the present we hav received no decision—not even an acknowledgment of the receipt of the book. We therefore suggest that the first supposedly erotic publication which A. Comstock considers be this work, which Mr. Wanamaker apparently will not read. If he can and will suppress that book—though it ought not to be suppressed—the people will giv him credit for sincerity in professions which they now sneer at as hypocritical and blackmailing.

In speaking of T. J. Morgan, the Socialist candidate for mayor, in the Chicago Jottings of April 11th, the types had it that he was "every inch a moral man." The last word should hav read hero, says our correspondent, "as a 'moral man' usually passes for one who simply conforms to the established, while the 'moral hero' is the demolisher of moral conceptions of his time. Taking morals in the limited sense the expression, as it reads, is quite accurate, but I prefer to consider Mr. Morgan in a wider sense than that."

This is from the Chicago News: "The death of William Herndon, the law partner of Mr. Lincoln, will be some relief to Minister Lincoln," was the remark of a well-known attorney of this city. "When Herndon had written his life of Lincoln he sent a copy of it to Robert, who was at that time quite a young man. The latter looked it over and wrote Herndon, asking him what he would take for the entire edition. Herndon replied that it was not for sale in that way. Young Lincoln then tried other means of buying up the work, but failed. He was of the opinion that while the author meant well there were things in the work which would not be of any special interest to the public and which were not becoming in the biography of a man like Abraham Lincoln. Young Lincoln, seeing that he could not buy up the edition, endeavored to get the author to issue another edition and eliminate therefrom the sections which were objectionable. Mr. Herndon refused to do this. As Mr. Lincoln was on the eve of his departure for the court of St. James a friend asked him if there was anything he could do for him after he had gone. The new minister replied with a wink in one eye, 'Yes, watch Herndon, and see that he writes no more biographies of my father.' The book actually haunted Robert Lincoln." The book "haunts" our English minister probably because it reveals that his father was not a Christian, and he is. There is one thing that no Christian wants to hav the truth about get out, and that is the heresy of their relativs or of great men.

"'Wanted to know: If the Prohibitionists were correctly represented by one of the editorial writers of the Voice when he told his German tonsorial friend that the Prohibitionists did not want to stop the drinking of liquor, only its sale over saloon bars? How will they get liquor to drink if no one can sell it? Will each be his own distiller? Or shall the government make it? Or shall it be distilled as at present and hid away in dives, hollow trees, barber shops, drug stores, and other hypocritical places?'—New York Truth Seeker, April 10th.

"The easiest way for THE TRUTH SEEKER to find out what it wants to know is to read some Prohibition platform, or read some recognized authority on the subject. If it will find a platform in which Prohibitionists propose to exercise a censorship over a man's diet, it can read the 'writer' referred to out of the party without further notice. The personal right of a man to drink milk swarming with bacilli if he wants to and the legal right of barter and sale in it are two different questions. How men will get liquor to drink under Prohibition doesn't trouble us. That is their funeral. Society isn't bound to establish public nuisances in order that they may gratify their private appetites."—Voice.

This whipping the devil around the stump does not answer the question at all. If the Prohibitionists do not want to stop liquor drinking why try to stop the selling? If a man wants to buy milk with bacilli in it, knowing the facts in the case, why is his right to purchase not the same as his right to drink? It is the use which does the damage, not the act of purchase; and the position of the Voice reminds us of the attitude assumed by that other old woman, of poetic memory, in reply to a query of her daughter:

"'Mother, may I go out to swim?'
'Oh yes, my darling daughter.
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
But don't go near the water.'"

"Bestow thy money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen or for sheep or for wine or for strong drink, or whatsoever thy soul desireth," whether it be milk filled with bacilli or beer loaded with a headache, would seem to be a biblical command, and the Prohibitionists are very pious.

MR. EDITOR: I can see nothing appropriate in any flower as a distinguishing badge to be worn by Freethinkers. Why not adopt the circle or the suggestiv triangle, inclosing a medallion of an emancipated man and woman with priestcraft and some of its toggery lying prone under their feet?

L. G. REED.

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I acknowledge receipt of the "Pictorial Text-Book." It is a grand work, and the strongest weapon against our common enemy, the church. I wish it could be placed in the home of every truth and freedom loving family where the English language is spoken. Pictures are more telling than words, and the effect is lasting, for "seeing is believing." The book is on my desk, and is viewed with interest by my friends of all shades of belief. The good results will follow, for it will stir their brains to thinking, and once moving in the right direction they will find the road to freedom and religious liberty. GUSTAV H. SOHEEL.

OBITUARY.

ROCKFORD, ILL., April 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When a good man or woman dies it is meet that some tribute be paid to their memory. Whipple Jilson departed this life March 24, 1891. He was a self-made man. Adversity seems only to hav drawn out and accentuated the strong points in his character. Truth, honesty, and industry were cardinal points in his creed, and his word was as good as his bond. When a young man he united himself with the Baptist church, but being a profound reasoner he finally evolved into one of the most Liberal of Liberals.

His was a life of adversity, he being crippled in infancy, but he paved his way with an inexhaustible fund of wit and humor, and where many in his condition would hav been a public charge, by untiring industry he amassed a competency. He was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not only read it himself, but took pains to distribute it among his friends. He had been a resident of Rockford, Ill., for many years, where he was widely known and respected. He was stricken down with the grip and lived but one week. He was seventy-two years of age. He leaves a wife, son, and daughter to mourn their loss.

A FRIEND AND NEIGHBOR.

PAINTED POST, N. Y., April 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see it is time for me to renew my subscription to your valuable paper. I hav taken it for a number of years, and it would be very hard for me to do without it. This little village of about one thousand population has a larger percentage of religious people than any other place I know of. As I am the only outspoken Freethinker, I could not get you another subscriber. We hav three churches here—Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist. I hav counted the people that attend them as they left the churches, and there was an average of three women to one man. I am now seventy-three years old, and hav always labored hard since I was twelve years old. I read from two to two and a half hours every evening before retiring. My reading is principally history and scientific works. The best history to me is Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." I hav read it through six times within the last thirty-three years. About forty-five years ago, I joined the Methodist church, and commenced reading the Bible, and the more I read the less I believed. After about ten years, in building a new church there was so much rascality performed that I became disgusted and withdrew.

Please find inclosed $6 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and "Freethinkers' Text-Book," cloth; balance for "Candle from Under the Bushel."

Please accept my best respects. B. C. WOOD.

SOUTH AMBOY, N. J., April 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is always a welcome visitor to my home, and every article that appears in its columns is given a careful perusal. I shall continue to take it as long as I can afford it, and I trust I may always be able to do so until the ship wrecks on the journey of life, and then I suppose the great Christian Whangdoodle will appease his wrath by roasting me in hell forever.

I notice a number of friends are advocating the formation of secret beneficial societies, and as I hav been a member of two for a number of years, I strongly indorse them. Mrs. Slenker opposes such a project, but she is not aware of the fact what an immense good those orders are doing to alleviate the sufferings of mankind. We do not know how soon we may meet with adversities, and those orders never see a member wanting. All benevolent orders are more or less Theistic and their superstitious rites are no doubt objectionable to every Atheist and Agnostic. When I joined those orders I was a Deist and my belief was perfectly in accord with the requirements of those orders, but since my evolution into Atheism I must frankly say I am liable to be expelled at any time, if any member sees fit to prefer charges against me.

There is no crime in secresy as long as it is for the protection of a craft or the advancement of mankind, but if societies meet in secret to plan the destruction of life and property, then I am strongly opposed to them.

I see the new constitution of Brazil has been amended again to suit the consciences of the clericals. For centuries the Catholics of Brazil hav trampled upon the rights and violated the consciences of non-Catholics, and now that radical Freethinkers are at the head of the provisional government, the archbishop of Bohia makes a lot of fuss about their inaugurating radical reforms. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. Editor, I hope you may continue to let your light shine by spreading the gospel of Atheism throughout the world. Yours sincerely, AUG. BEHN.

ASH FLAT, ARK., March 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER for about thirteen years. I am well pleased with its contents. There are very few outspoken Freethinkers in this country. So I am almost alone to contend for the truth as reason and common sense teach.

I herein send you a piece clipped from our county paper. What do you think of such lies as this?

Yours truly, a truth seeker, W. H. ROBERTS.

News from Howard lake, Minn., says that all Wright county is excited over a phenomenal birth, which occurred four months ago at Boone Bridge, four miles south of this point. The animal is described by those who hav seen it as a devil. Its body is covered with hair a couple of inches long. It has horns, a tail, and a foot which is a cross between that of a man and a dog. Its mother is Mrs. Sarah A. Morris, a woman of English parentage, and of the best connections. She became violent on sight of the monstrosity, and was sent to St. Peters this week hopelessly insane. The devil-child developed rapidly and now weighs twenty-two pounds. It already shows a greater degree of intelligence than a child usually does at the age of one year. Members of the Morris family explain the phenomenon from an accident that occurred about two months before the birth. A peddler of Bibles came to the house, and Mrs. Morris attempted to drive him away with the remark that she would as soon see the devil in her house as the Bible. Growing angry at the remark the book agent raised his arms as if to strike her, and said dramatically, "I will send a devil to you."

April 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having struck a serio-comic vein and worked the lead a little I inclose results to you for assay. Should you find it worth a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER cabinet and feel disposed to place it there, perhaps your friends would like to look it over. "A little nonsense," etc. W.

THIS OUGHT TO BRING HOLY JOHN TO TIME.

Uncle Sam, as we all know
  Throughout this mighty nation,
Carries letters to and fro
  For our accommodation.
He carries books and papers too—
  Too many things to mention
According to direction true
  Can go with good attention.

Bad men thought in this they saw
  A way to bring them cash, sir;
Bad books were sent (ag'in the law)
  That youths might read such trash, sir.
Uncle Sam'l vowed that he Could never hav such doin';
'Twas so very plain to see
  'Twould bring us all to ruin.

Uncle Sam, who said he'd take
  Some way to fix things right, sir,
'Pinted Mr. Wanamake
  To hold such fellows tight, sir.
J. said he was bound to act
  Whenever called upon, sir.
Never till then would he crack
  The head of anyone, sir.

Never would he hunt the game
  Or look for any sinner,
But when caught he'd take the same
  And serve it up for dinner.
He must take a book when sent
  And see if it should go, sir,
Through the mails with good intent,
  And answer Yes, or No, sir.

One Macdonald sent a book
  (Mac was in doubtful mood, sir),
Asked J. if he'd in it look,
  And say if it was good, sir.
"Holy Bible" it was called,
  Books both "Old" and "New," sir;
Mentioned several verses bald
  To learn how them he'd view, sir.

Though he asked him o'er and o'er,
  No word from J. it brought, sir;
Never would J. answer more,
  He feared that he was caught, sir.
Why this fear and why not tell,
  To make his actions plain, sir?
Mac was called an Infidel;
  'Twould bring to J. no gain, sir.

Christian had Macdonald been
  He'd got a ready answer;
But, as may be clearly seen,
  "Truth seekers" seldom can, sir.
Now, Macdonald, keep it up,
  Don't let the bigot fool you;
'Tis for him a bitter cup;
  He'd like the church to rule you.

"Seventy-six" is still alive,
  True men will swell the chorus,
Bigotry must never thrive
  While Freedom's flag is o'er us.
Yes, TRUTH SEEKER, keep it up;
  With bigots you are handy.
Make him drink his nasty sup,
  Says Yankee Doodle Dandy. W.

CATHLAMET, WASH., March 27, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Having left the sage-clad ranges of Wyoming, above the clouds and now five to ten feet under the snow, I find myself to-day in the most northern and western state of the Union, the state famous for its Liberal and rustling population—Washington; on the banks of that Hudson of the West, the wide, deep, far-reaching Columbia; in the city destined to become the metropolis and chief seaport of southern Washington, Cathlamet.

Eastern Liberals, think of this. Here along the Columbia on the Washington side Freethought is in the majority, and from what I can learn of other parts of Washington a large percentage of the population are of the Liberal stamp. Nowhere in America to-day does the hustler hustle to more effect than in the young state of Washington.

Why is this? I answer:

1. Because the Liberal man works, thinks, and plans for this world—the betterment of himself and the place wherein he livs.

2. Washington has the best harbors, the finest timber, the richest soil, the most desirable and agreeable climate, in the world.

3. Floods or famins will never visit her towns or ranches. God will never send his cyclones here to rend his house of prayer, and Christians never will hav occasion to ask him to furnish them a greater abundance of rain.

The forests of thousands of years hav lived and died upon these ranges. Their remains constitute the rich, damp, deep soil beneath our feet. Still the forest's latest generation of trees flourish. Their massiv trunks tower skyward straight as arrows for two hundred feet. He who wants a farm of virgin soil must, wherever he may be in western Washington, clear these wooden giants from the land, then he can plant seed and harvest the biggest crop on earth without a prayer.

Eve must hav eaten the kind of apples that Liberals grow in Washington. Washington apples contain no worms.

Perhaps one reason why Christians get lukewarm in Washington is because in this land of plenty they can find nothing to pray for.

At present the town of Cathlamet, Wash., has no church and no minister. She has a live newspaper edited by a Liberal rustler, also a "truth seeker" lawyer with a lively "tum-tum," and it has been said "he never told a lie." Cathlamet, I am sorry to say, contains one ruin; it is a sad, sad sight to see; it is not a church or a saloon, but it is the Wahkiakum county jail.

The map in Harper's School Geography represents a railroad down the north bank of the Columbia. This railroad has not yet been built. If the Cathlamet people knew how to pray so as to remove mountains they would hav this railroad before the month is over. But in spite of prayer, with their own wild Western energy they will remove mountains of timber and the iron steed will race erelong against the swift boats of the Columbia, while at Cathlamet's dock Northwestern products will be transferred from land to ocean, onward to the markets of the world.

On the horizon of Washington's future there are no flies.

Lands of sage-brush may parch and inland prairies under cloudless skies may cry in vain for water, but the moss upon the Northwest spruce will be forever damp and green, and crystal springs will gush from out the rock-ribbed everlasting hills of Washington. DR. BOYNTON.

HANOVERTON, O., April 12, 291.

MR. EDITOR: After reading Dr. Conger's article in your issue of April 11th, I feel impelled to scratch down a few words in reply, in a perfectly friendly spirit.

The claim that modern Spiritualism came teaching and healing the sick, and that its teachings hav been superior teachings, is as old as the oldest fraudulent faith in existence, and has no bearing upon the question of its truthfulness.

Will the doctor be kind enough to mention the important subjects of interest to humanity which the lessons of Spiritualism hav made clear?

If scientists and philosophers hav failed to explain the manifestations of Spiritualism, is it not fair to assume that they hav not been explained, but merely insisted upon as true without any reason to justify the claim?

The doctor appears to think that a scientist, skeptic, or clergyman who can be induced to believe in Spiritualism is therefore honorable, while one who cannot be so induced is a scoffer, persecutor, and hypocrit.

If demonstration has really been the converting cause in a majority of the million cases in America, why does the doctor lament the absence from the ranks of most of the scientists, philosophers, Liberal journals, and public men? And if his estimate be correct, does it not suggest the suspicion that the best of judgment rejects it, and that the possessors of this judgment differ with the doctor in regard to the demonstration being as plain as that of life?

If there is as much fraud in Spiritualism as there is in church, state, business, or Liberal press, that is sufficient. We do not ask for more. It is the claim of Spiritualism that it is the truth, and, as the doctor says, begs for an opportunity to demonstrate its claims, and yet when a man with the critical acumen to detect fraud, and who will submit to no conditions favorable to its employment, starts out in search of a spirit, do not the professional custodians of the dear departed prefer to go it blind, or rather to not go it at all rather than face the probability of exposure?

We fear the doctor has overestimated the importance of the truth of Spiritualism, even if it were demonstrated to be such. The truth is, that how they shall manage to liv now is of much more importance to the majority of men than whether they shall liv hereafter.

In regard to the enemies which Spiritualism has met and still survived, cannot Christianity discount it a hundred to one, and will the doctor, therefore, admit its truthfulness?

The doctor proposes to substantiate Spiritualism by the same kind of evidence used in business, government, and law courts. This will not do. Evidence produces belief only, which may be correct or incorrect. But when you desire knowledge, nothing short of demonstration will giv the desired result. Now, if the doctor can demonstrate with the same clearness that spirits do communicate with men as I can that dynamite will explode, then I will know that it is a truth and can make it clear to all men. The fact that it is denied by men who hav shown a willingness to investigate is the strongest kind of evidence that it is a faith and probably not a fact.

We desire to suggest to the doctor that when he communicates with the next spirit, whom he recognizes and hears talk and sing and sees manifest many attributes of humanity, he feel its pulse and place a thermometer under its tongue, and then report its temperature and the number of pulsations per minute, and then let us know if it disappeared in full view of its friends. Why should spirits who can talk use a telegraph, and why must these communications always be through a medium who receives money for conducting the séance? As regards conditions precluding the possibility of fraud or deception, that depends upon who is to be deceived.

The doctor does not think there is any excuse for an intelligent man in our Eastern cities denying the so-called truths of Spiritualism, and yet he admits that, with a few exceptions, the scientists, philosophers, skeptics, and even the clergy do so. We feel positiv the doctor has made a mistake in accusing men like Ingersoll, Washburne, and Macdonald of insincerity and a disposition to ignore anything in the shape of a fact. The reason these men do not become Spiritualists is that nature and education hav produced in them the conditions precluding at least the probability of fraud and deception being successfully employed in their cases.

As a prophet the doctor has not secured our confidence, and his statement that the spirit world will soon be heard and felt we take with the same amount of salt as we do Bible prophecy.

The doctor's concluding statement that Spiritualism is a fixed fact as much as sunshine or electricity, as well proved as any science, and of more value than all the discoveries of the last forty years, refers only to mediums, who, like preachers, make a living out of the delusion which they practice and advocate. W. H. KINTNER.

HANKINS, N. Y., April 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: This being the third time I hav written to you, it may be appropriate for me to tell you and my Liberal friends a little of this place, and something about the people with whom I hav lived for the last two years. This place, Hankins, derived its name from an old family who settled here some years ago. They owned a tract of land of about one thousand acres. The old homestead is still inhabited by some of that family. The village has about one hundred inhabitants. It is situated on the New York, Lake Erie, & Western railroad, in the valley of the beautiful Delaware river, which flows along on its winding course on its way to the Atlantic. Lumbering, in days gone by, was a great source of income to this locality. I hav heard people say that they hav seen one hundred or more rafts glide along on this beautiful river daily. Now you will not see one hundred in a season. Our income now depends upon the farms and bluestone quarries. Our stone shipments are from five to six hundred car-loads per year. Our milk shipments from here to your city average about seventy-five cans daily. We hav one hotel, two saloons, four general stores, and no manufacturing (a good place for a mechanic). The people here are the average industrious kind, mostly slaves to the church, of different denominations, though principally Catholics. We hav no church inside our village, but we hav plenty within an hour's drive, but we contrive to hav mass, or meeting, about every Sunday. Just think what a cheek the Christians hav when they come to lay out a diocese, or section, and send their priests and preachers out amongst us unasked for, and they hav the cheek to say after a time, "Your dues to the church are so and so." What are they but pious thieves? I had a certain lady ask me for $1 for the preacher. I answered, "Mrs. ——, that is against my principle." "What!" said she, "do you not think it is necessary to hav a church?" I answered, "No, ma'am." Then she said, "You must be something like that, that——" I interrupted, saying, "Ingersoll!" "Yes," she said. I answered saying, that "I try to follow that gentleman as near as it is in my power." She answered saying, "This is the first time I ever heard anyone express themselvs in that way." I hav also been asked to contribute to foreign missions. My answer was, No, that I attended to "home missions" first. And my punishment for all the above is that the people hav elected me justice of the peace of this town.

I write the above principally for the benefit of your younger readers like myself, who hav, or are about to, start in life for themselvs. I say to them, never be afraid of your colors; be honest; say what you mean, and do what you promis as near as possible; try and never promis more than you think you can fulfill; try and let beer and liquors devour themselvs, and keep out of such company, and you will sail through life with ease. In a word, be a gentleman or lady. Respectfully, W. S GALLOWAY.

LA LOGIA SINALOA, MEXICO, March 15, E.M 291.

MR. EDITOR: I left Lincoln county, Kan., last November, for this place. I hav delayed writing to the TRUTH SEEKER family in order that I might write from personal observation. Many friends of progress and reform requested me to giv my verdict of this country through your paper, and here it is. A perfect climate; the richest soil I ever saw; more game to the square mile than I ever saw before, such as geese, ducks, turkeys, quails, rabbits, deer, hogs, and some I hav not learned the name of. The colonists gather duck eggs on the little islands in Topolobampo bay during the month of January by the wagon-load, and with the four-hundred-foot seine they catch fish by the ton. One need not toil all night here and not catch a fish. Turtles as large as a dining-room table are here, and if anyone is too lazy to go out and catch one he can buy a three or four hundred pound one for fifty cents from an Indian almost any time. I hav seen hundreds of orange trees, and I hav yet to see one but that was loaded down with fruit. We buy them here for $5 a thousand and the nicest I ever ate, and I tell you, if you never ate a Sinaloa orange you want to try them, for they are the finest in the world. I went in swimming about three times a week in January.

The Frureta river is a clear mountain stream of soft water twenty rods wide and three or four feet deep in low time. I landed on the bank of this stream on December 23d, opposit La Logia, and while fording the stream with our two hundred and ten horses and forty-three cows I heard the steam whistle at the saw and grist mill, the first I had heard since I left Guyamas, where our party divided, a part going by boat and the rest by land. We got over all right and turned our stock into the colony's pasture of two or three hundred acres fenced with Gliden wire, and for the first time I saw a banana grove, and I do not believe even God could see a fellow there, but it would be a splendid place for him to take a walk in the heat of the day. The farm here, I am told, is three hundred acres. Corn was in roasting ears, tomatoes ripe, and the finest sweet potatoes I ever saw. I went into the strawberry patch. I found two or three half ripe. We had the first ripe one on January 8th. Now they are rotting on the ground. We planted seven acres of Irish potatoes in January—no, the last day of December. They do well here. In fact, everything does well here that has a fair chance. The great trouble is water. They irrigate with a Colorado pump. The Mexicans irrigate with a high water ditch. That sometimes plays out. We are now cutting a low water ditch. It will cost $100,000. It will be finished in July.

This ditch is cut by men coöperating and not money. Some put in horses, some leather for harness. The people at La Logia send us up vegetables. I am developing my lungs driving bulls on a big plow, and when the ditch is done I may use them to uproot damnationism. There are only two or three cremationists here and a few Spiritualists. Some of the Spiritualists tell me they know a medium who will let one write out three or four questions, seal them up, put the letter in his trunk or hide it, and she will answer all correctly. I hav prepared my questions and promised $100 for the ditch fund when they are answered.

But one thing I want to say to the friends of Freethought is that here among the five hundred Freethinkers, all unbelievers except two or three, I hav found the most intelligence, the most brotherly and sisterly regard for each other, and the purest morality. Everybody seems to put all confidence in everybody else. There are no locks or bolts. A hundred men go to work on the ditch at the ring of the bell. They are strung out for over a mile, and no boss; each feels in duty bound to do his best. We hav loud discussions at times and fight some mighty battles, but ideas are the shot and shell and love the projecting or hurling power. And again I will say, there are more books of brain and thought right here than I ever saw before among so many. There is a house full at the bay, another house full at La Logia, and nearly every man has a trunk or valise full and some both. And I believe our head men are as pure in mind as Confucius or the Grecian Stoics.

Also, Mexico is away ahead of the United States in some things. Here there is a more complete separation of church and state. Church property has been confiscated here. The little the church does hav is taxed. Such a thing as a convent is not known. And the clerical scamps are forbidden to wear their holy gowns on the streets. Neither are they allowed to marry anybody. The priest is a mighty little fellow whom the Indian has but little respect for. The stores are all open here on Sunday and everyone does as he likes. This is a very Liberal government and a very rich country.

I will only mention one little thing. Mescal is the Mexicans' drunk medicin. It is distilled from the maguey plant, which grows without irrigation or cultivation. It makes an excellent alcohol, which sells here for a dollar a gallon. The leaf that is wasted here would make more rope and binding twine than would supply the world. I will send you a specimen of the fiber. Thousands of tons of this fiber go to waste annually.

There is no sickness here of any kind.

I inquired at the post-office if any TRUTH SEEKER came here, and was told No. I want you to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER, also another one of those picture books.

If any Freethinker wants to know about this country, I will answer any questions I can through your paper, if allowed, but will not otherwise on account of my correspondence being large already.

It grieved me to hear of the death of some of our old warhorses. Love to all the brethren at Corinth, Laodicea, and Mesopotamia, and Tipton, and from beyond Jordan.

A. BUTTERFIELD.

KANSAS CITY, MO., April 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: A few days ago I bought two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER at a news-stand; I read them; they pleased me—echoed my sentiments—and yesterday I sent $3 to pay for fifty-two numbers, at the end of which time I shall expect to renew and hav some of my friends join me also.

You are seeking for the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; what more worthy object could be sought after? Every civilized human being should join you in the search until bigotry, hypocrisy, priesthood, and fanatical superstition hav been brought to light and by the power of truth crushed ne'er to rise again.

The letter of Thomas Burk in the March 28th number, respecting Spiritualism, interested me, and perhaps a few words of my experience in that field may interest some.

When I grew into manhood I was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and believed I had found the truth and it had made me free. As years grew on apace and the mind began to assert itself, reason overthrew the doctrin of "vicarious atonement," and I concluded not to enter heaven through the blood of an innocent man, but that if to heaven I must go, it should be on my own merits.

Cast out thus on the sea of uncertainty and doubt, and looking for a place to anchor, I was charmed with the beautiful illusions of Spiritualism; I embraced; I became a Spiritualist. Why had I not heard of this before? It was that for which I sought and longed because I found it naught.

I do not desire to speak slightingly of a subject which seems to offer the only rational solution of the mystery of after-life, but Spiritualism has been brought into such a ridiculous use by so many self-styled mediums that one almost loses respect for even the most sacred parts of its creed.

How absurd to think that simply because the spirit is released from this earthly form, it can come back, dodge into the cellar, and under the old apple-barrel discover hidden treasure; look inside a letter, commit to memory its contents, and then repeat it through ignorant individuals styling themselvs mediums; go down into the ground and discover ores; look into the future and tell whether Tim McCarty will love and marry Bridget Finnigan; tramp around through the mud and tell where Mrs. Sampson lost her ring, and a thousand and one things which people believe disembodied spirits can do. Is it any wonder, then, that Spiritualists themselvs become disgusted at the very word?

Then, again, who of us in pursuing an honest investigation after the truth in Spiritualism, has not found more fraud than truth? And again, who has not found some things in connection therewith that were passing strange, which they could not explain? The answer is, none.

My investigation, so far, made in the spirit of doubt always, has demonstrated to me that:

There is a power that can come in communication with our minds and produce results we could not otherwise obtain, which power seems not to be from within us.

A person may be mesmerized by the spirit or essence of an inanimate person or body, and talk, act, imitate the voice and manner, and take on the individuality of such person as when living.

Questions relativ to the death, or as to the time or place of any event in the questioner's life, may be answered correctly if such questioner will keep the mind on the subject inquired about.

Valuable advice in reference to business matters may be satisfactorily given.

The change we call death does not make a bad spirit a good one, but an evil-minded spirit before death or dissolution will afterward return as deceptiv and evil-minded as ever.

All ideas of time, distance, and amounts seem to them vague and indefinit.

At times I am controled by this power myself, and while I am unable to giv any idea as to whence it originates, yet I know I am conscious of all around me, and that what I am writing or saying at the time is not thought or evolved from my own brain, as I am making no mental effort and personally know nothing of the subject. That I can and do often get advice on business matters by this power, and that I am successful in business, I boldly affirm.

I would not use this power for the purpose of gratifying the curiosity of the credulous, or making money from the superstitious, but I am honest in my endeavor to understand from whence it comes. I hav asked these so-called spirits about Christ, God, and their spiritual life, and they answer: "We hav not seen Christ; we know nothing more of him than you; we hav not seen God; we are no nearer him than you; we seem to be no nearer the solution of the great problem of life, existence, than when on earth. Superstition and ignorance prevail here as on earth, and many are pursuing the same line of thought; as regards the future, we are told of a higher life which comes to those who work out their salvation; we are controled by laws above which we cannot rise, as when on earth; our plan of work is love; many of us cannot come back to you; those who hav gone before a great while are not here; they hav passed up higher."

While they all giv the same general answers, yet some express it in different manner, showing always the same characteristic tendencies of the individual when here.

I hav written this much not as a believer in the phenomena as being from or caused by disembodied spirits, not as a disbeliever of spiritual manifestations, but as an earnest investigator, a seeker after truth, hoping that what I may do may start the bright minds of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to think, to act, and gather in the experiences of others, so that we may learn what there is in it.

I am willing to offer my services free for what they may be worth in the hands of honest investigators, either to make Spiritualism odious if untrue, or noble and exalted if it is the truth.

To that end I will endeavor to answer such questions as are sent me in honest inquiry after truth, and not pertaining to charlatanism or individualities, by submitting them to the power of so-called spirits, and if they cannot fight their own battle let them suffer defeat and be forever silent; we shall then know that in them there is not truth; if they can by their answers demonstrate to a reasoning and logical mind that Spiritualism is a fact, they will enjoy the reward of truth.

Shall we put them to the test?

Yours for the truth, ALLEN C. WEED.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Boyish Visions.

"God and all the foolish clan" is rich. He must feel at home for thanksgiving when put in company with goblins, ghosts, fairies, and flits. What is there about them all understandable at all by childhood or scholarship, except that they are "make-believe," as the children say, and lies? A moment is long enough to wish to entertain them again. JOHN P. GUILD.

In the splendor of the sunset, mantling western skies with gold,
Purpling hills and gilding treetops, spreading glories tongue ne'er told,
Saw I once through childish fancy all of heaven's scenes unrolled,
But, alas! my mature vision sees but clouds and hills and wold.

In the soughing of the south wind, in the waves among the weirs,
In the dashing of the cascade, scattering countless crystal tears,
Heard I through my boyish fancy voices whispering hopes and fears,
But they now are nature's noises, and they grate upon my ears.

In the flashing of the lightning saw I God's abode of light,
In the rolling of the thunders heard I stories of his might,
And my boyish heart would feel him close beside my bed at night,
But they now are nature's forces, if my reason speaks aright.

Oh, the foolish dreams of boyhood! Oh, the wisdom of the man!
Yet I often think the children understand what man ne'er can
About heaven and unseen voices, God and all the foolish clan,
And I wish for just a moment that the child would teach the man.

Lotteries.

The word "lottery" is fast becoming synonymous with "humbug;" for such experience has proved it to be. It holds a place among our most ruinous dissipations, and has proved a curse to its dupes. Recollect that thousands of the youth, the older people, the impoverished households, are robbed by the lottery gambling habit—victims of the well-cast lines baited with visions of gold that never materialize! Not only robbed of money, but of their business ideas and their morality—their self-respect. It is far more satisfactory to engage in some steady, honest business occupation. Is there not more certainty of success in doing this? Bear in mind that the expensiv lottery ticket brings success only by chance, while on the other hand good, steady business habits bring a sure reward. Some lotteries bring no success whatever—not even by chance. It is certain that a number, and probably all, use fraudulent methods, and when you invest in a ticket, the money is simply squandered, thrown away.

Even in some of the most satisfactorily conducted lotteries not over half of the money entrusted them is awarded. The largest part is coolly pocketed by the company. In other words, the public, for every dollar invested, receives in return but half a dollar at the most. In spite of this there are many people professing respectability who constantly patronize these thieving institutions.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

Mustache, a Military Dog.

If the deeds of brave men find their record in print, may not a corner now and then be given to brave doings of our four-footed friends, the dogs? Probably no dog has ever rendered such good service as the celebrated poodle whose name stands at the head of this short notice. French by birth, he followed the fortunes of the French army through most of the consulate wars, winning special honors at Marengo. At the battle of Austerlitz he rescued the regimental standard from an Austrian soldier, when in the act of snatching it from the hand of its mortally wounded bearer. The plucky poodle drove off the assailant, and then, seizing the tattered colors in his teeth, dragged them triumphantly back to his own company. There is nothing said as to his personal appearance and bearing, or whether he was a large or a small, a black or a white poodle; but for his brave conduct, as above recorded, he was decorated on the field of Austerlitz by one of the French officers.

The Glass of Water Under the Hat.

An innocent trick, which may afford some amusement at an indoor party of young people, is as follows:

Place a glass of water upon the table, put a hat over it, and offer to lay a wager with any of the company that you will empty the glass without lifting the hat. When your proposition is accepted, desire the company not to touch the hat, and then get under the table and commence making a sucking noise, smacking your lips at intervals, as though you were swallowing the water with infinit satisfaction to yourself. After a minute or two come from under the table, and address the person who took your wager with, "Now, sir." His curiosity being of course excited, he will lift up the hat in order to see whether you hav really performed what you promised, and the instant he does so take up the glass, and after having swallowed its contents, say, "You hav lost, sir, for you see I hav drunk the water without raising the hat."

Correspondence.

HENRY, S. D., March 31, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines. I go to school and study physiology, reading, spelling, arithmetic, and grammar. My teacher's name is Miss McCarl. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. This morning I took a TRUTH SEEKER and read some stories. I like the Children's Corner. I will be ten years old November 1st. A man gave me one of your books, "Apples of Gold." I hav a little brother named Robert Ingersoll Short. It snowed three or four times to-day. Your friend,

MAUD SHORT.

PRAIRIE CITY, IA., March 31, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is the first time I hav ever written to the Children's Corner. Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about fourteen years. I like the Corner and the children's letters. I am thirteen years old. I go to school. I read in the Fifth Reader. I study arithmetic, geography, grammar, physiology, history, spelling, writing. We liv in the country. Our school is not far away. I hav three brothers and one sister. Our school will be out the 27th of this month. Our teacher's name is Daisy Turner. We hav been having a great deal of snow here this winter. I must stop for this time, and I will write some time again to the Corner. I remain,

Your friend, NELLIE E. WILSON.

PHILADELPHIA, March 18, 1891.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Madam: I hav now arrived at an age (fourteen years) when I believe it to be my duty to engage activly in the cause of Liberalism. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am always delighted to read it, especially the Children's Corner, from which I learn that many of your correspondents are girls about my own age. It is from this fact that I now take courage to address you, to let you know that there is one more Liberal girl who has one Liberal sister and four Liberal brothers, none of whom hav ever been Sunday-school scholars. The most of my time is devoted to music, and we hav our Sunday concerts at home, to the enjoyment of many friends who visit us. I will now close, with many wishes for your prosperity. Yours respectfully,

BESSIE SCHAFFER.

[Welcome, Bessie, and may you never regret joining our band in the Children's Corner.—ED. C. C.]

HANOVERTON, O., March 22, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am a stranger to the Corner, and thinking that perhaps you had room for one more little girl, I ask permission to enter and become acquainted. I was nine years old the 29th of January, so you see I can celebrate my birthday and Paine's at the same time. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner and also like to look at the pictures. I hav two brothers; the older one is seven years old and the younger is five. They like to look at the pictures. My older brother and I go to school. I study reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, physiology, language, and drawing. I read in the Third and Fourth Readers. My teacher's name is Miss Minnie Ray. School will be out the last of April. We are not to hav any summer school. Archie and I do not go until the religious exercises are over. I like to go to school. I hav not missed a day of school this term. I hav forty-six headmarks. There are eleven in my class. Archie reads in the First and Second Readers. I hav a Maltese cat. Its name is John. I hav "The Story Hour." I like it very much. As this is my first letter I will close.

Your Freethinker friend,

ALICE KINTNER.

[Welcome to the Corner, Alice.—ED. C. C.]

AUSTINVILLE, PA., March 22, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never written to the Children's Corner I thought I would let you hear from me. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about eight years. I like to read the letters from the boys and girls very much. I am twelve years old. I go to school and study the following: Reading, arithmetic, spelling, history, physiology, geography, intellectual arithmetic, and writing. My father keeps bees—he has about seventy colonies. There are three kinds of bees in a hive—the queen, drone, and worker. The worker does all the work—gathers the honey and builds the comb of wax from its own body. The life of a worker bee is short in the summer, as they liv only a few weeks. The drone is a male and has no sting. It can be handled as safely as a fly. The worker bee cruelly kills all of the drones as winter approaches. The queen is a female and lays many thousands of eggs in a single summer. One of the strangest things about the bees is, they can raise a queen, drone, or worker from any egg they may choose. It is thought this is done by the kind of food fed to the young bees, and the shape and size of the comb cells they are raised in. The queen has a sting, but cannot be provoked to use it, only when meeting another queen. I could say much more about the bees, but it might make my letter too long, so I will close. Wishing the Corner success, I remain,

Your Liberal friend, ALICE ROTHWELL.

COLLEGE POINT, March 27, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to the Children's Corner before, and as our school has given us a holiday until March 31st, I thought I would write, for probably I may never hav the chance again. I am kept quite busy at school. My studies are rhetoric, civil government, German, English history, and physical geography.

My favorit study is physical geography. We hav an excellent teacher for it, she makes it so very interesting.

At the end of each school month we hav a lecture delivered to us, and the subject of the last one was "Emerson."

I am quite puzzled about that lecture, and I would like to ask a question—Was Emerson a Christian?

I spoke to the speaker, but he would hav it that he was a Christian. The speaker was a minister.

I believe, but I am not sure, that I am the only Freethinker in the school, except my sister. There are not many Freethinkers here, and we do not hav any Liberal meetings, but we are only nine miles from New York city, and there we hav the privilege of hearing Mr. Hugh Pentecost.

I'm afraid this letter will take up considerable space, so I will close, but if you will permit it, this shall not be my last letter to the Children's Corner.

Yours for Freethought and Reform,

HERMINA A. BUCHER.

[Emerson was not a Christian in the usual acceptation of the term. By no means.—ED. C. C.]

SHERMAN, MICH., March 31, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: As you approve of my plan, I will write and ask some history questions to open the history class.

Who discovered America?
Who gave his name to America?
When and where did the "Pilgrims" land?
When and where was the first mint to make coin set up?
What was stamped on the coin?
By what name was the coin called?

Now, all the above questions are short and easy, and all of you can answer them without trouble.

Our snow has nearly all vanished from sight. My people are making maple sugar, and as some of the readers of the Children's Corner liv "away down South" where they do not make maple sugar, I will tell you the way we make it. This spring we tapped nearly five hundred maple trees, but hav trees enough to tap a thousand. The way we tap is this: We bore a hole in the tree with a three-quarter inch bit, and drive the spile under the hole made by the bit. Beneath this we hang the bucket. We use tin buckets. We draw the sap to the "shanty" in barrels. Our "shanty" is built of logs. We use an evaporator to boil our sap in. As the sap boils the water rises in the form of steam and the "sweet" is left. It goes to the back of the evaporator, where, when it is thick enough, all you hav to do is turn the faucet and the molasses runs out. All this time the cold sap is running into the front part of the evaporator.

The molasses is taken to the house, where it is put in the large sugar pan and boiled until it "wakes" when dropped on the snow or ice or in cold water. Then it will grain and you will hav maple sugar.

Well, my letter is too long now and probably will land in the waste-basket, so I will close. Your Freethinker friend,

M. AURORA SOUTHWICK.

LISBON, IA., March 12, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: My Dear Friend: In the Corner I hav seen letters from little Infidel children, and you often ask them to write again and tell of the country they liv in, etc. So I thought I would write and tell you of the country I liv in, which is the central part of the United States, so I might interest my Eastern and also my Western friends. My home is in eastern Iowa, Linn county, so that part is all I know much about, but it is as beautiful and as good as nature could make it. We raise in Iowa corn, oats, rye, and a little wheat. Our fruits are apples, cherries, plums, and lots of small fruits. We hav nearly every kind of vegetable. Melons are raised along the Cedar river. Hogs and cattle are raised to ship. Hogs are fattened, loaded in wagons, and then hauled to the buyer. The reason I told you how we take our hogs to market is because my mother said it would be quite a sight for some people in the Eastern parts of the United States, because they do not raise stock to sell, corn being too scarce.

Iowa's soil is very rich and productiv; it has no stones nor hills—you could walk miles before you would find a stone to throw at a bird in the air. We hav some quarries in which we get our stones for building purposes.

I will now tell you of the Cedar river. It is noted for its high bluffs along the river. There is one place that is called "Palisades;" it is a very pretty place. It has high bluffs, some being over a hundred feet. They are almost straight up and down; nobody could climb the sides at any place. There are large caves in the rocks; we could not get to them without a boat. There are three large hollows—their names are "Dark," "Spring," and "Back" hollow. It seems as if you cannot get from one hollow to the other without a boat. There is one man, named Minott, who built himself a house and stables and has lots of boats to rent. So when people go there they put their horses in the stable and then hire boats, and they almost always enjoy themselvs. People often go there and tent awhile in the summer. It is a sort of summer resort.

I would like to correspond with Miss Annie Ballhorn, if she cares to write to me. I will say something to Miss Ballhorn. I am not as tall as she is, but weigh more. I am five feet two or three inches tall, weigh one hundred and fifty-one pounds. I am thirteen years of age. My letter is getting rather long. Of course I would like to see my letter in print, but if you think it is too long you need not print it. If you hav time, Miss Wixon, please drop a line to me, and all other children of the Corner are cordially invited to write to me. I will now close, wishing success to the Corner. I remain,

Your Freethinking friend,

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., says

My Medical Discovery seldom takes hold of two people alike! Why? Because no two people have the same weak spot. Beginning at the stomach it goes searching through the body for any hidden humor. Nine times out of ten, inward humor makes the weak spot. Perhaps it's only a little sediment left on a nerve or in a gland; the Medical Discovery slides it right along, and you find quick happiness from the first bottle. Perhaps it's a big sediment or open sore, well settled somewhere, ready to fight. The Medical Discovery begins the fight, and you think it pretty hard, but soon you thank me for making something that has reached your weak spot. Price, $1.50. This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

REV. R. T. HANKS, editor of the Dallas, Tex., Western Baptist, has been made the subject of two grand jury indictments, one for libeling Rev. E. Hardy, the other for publishing that Rev. E. B. Hardy, Rev. L. H. Scruggs, Rev. S. J. Grant, and Rev. A. M. Johnson are "paid scandal-mongers of the Baptist Herald and notorious liars."

ANNA DICKINSON is at liberty, and will lecture.

PRESIDENT HARRISON started on a national tour on the 14th.

A EUROPEAN war this summer is pronounced "probable."

THE Baptist church at Era, Tex., was blown down by a providential storm on the 12th.

THE Minnesota legislature adjourned without passing Alliance measures. It voted down the anti-tights bill.

IT is cabled that "the illiterate vote" at the Sligo election "was cast by the influence of the clergy" against the Parnell candidate.

Two parsons of Hamburg, Germany, hav given scandal to the pious, one by disclaiming belief in original sin, the other by pronouncing the resurrection narrativ legendary.

A MEXICAN dispatch says: "Most of our people who travel return home with new ways and new means, the clergy only sticking to old notions and old forms of political disciplin."

THE Columbus centenary having given rise to some glorification of Queen Isabella, there are called forth denunciations of her as a "miserable, bigoted tool of priests, who ruined her country."

IT is now said that the shooting of striking miners in Pennsylvania by deputy sheriffs was unprovoked. Two later riots, on the 17th, are reported, and blamed on the workingmen.

GEN. G. W. STROH, the just retired mayor of Sunbury, Pa., on the 13th was arrested and fined 63 cents per oath for swearing twenty-seven oaths. The oaths had been uttered in a controversy with a lawyer, and jotted down by a personal and political enemy.

JESSE LOCKWOOD, of White Plains, N. Y., on the 11th beat his wife, aged sixty-one, to death with a club, saying the Lord commanded it. A few days previous he rang the Methodist church bell and proclaimed that the Lord desired a sacrifice of human life. He has often been called a religious crank.

COSTA RICA, Central America, has been depressed in industry by Holy Week, in which all the legends connected with Christ's life hav been acted, to the delight of "the women and the children and the people of the humbler classes," though, the dispatch says, "the prominent men, the representativ minds of the republic, hav all been beautifully scarce."

BLAINE has given Italy a reply containing little of conciliation or of explicit assurance that reparation will be made. He says that the attorney-general is considering whether prosecution of the lynchers can be had in federal courts, and "if it shall be found, as seems probable, that criminal proceedings can only be taken in the courts of Louisiana, the president can in this direction do no more than to urge upon the state officers the duty of promptly bringing the offenders to trial. This was done in his telegram to the governor of Louisiana as early as the 15th of March." If, he says, the state grand jury fails to act, the federal government will consider whether there be other modes of redress; and, he concludes, if "it should appear that among those killed . . . there were some Italian subjects who were resident or domiciled in that city, agreeably to our treaty with Italy, and not in violation of our immigration laws, and who were abiding in the peace of the United States and obeying the laws thereof and of the state of Louisiana, and that the public officers charged with the duty of protecting life and property in that city connived at the work of the mob, or . . . failed to take any steps for the preservation of the public peace and afterward to bring the guilty to trial, the president would, under such circumstances, feel that a case was established that should be submitted to the consideration of Congress with a view to the relief of the families of the Italian subjects who had lost their lives by lawless violence."

Gems of Thought.

THERE was a time when the most powerful of human intellects were deluded by the gibberish of the astrologer and the alchemist; and just so there was a time when the most enlightened and virtuous statesmen thought it the first duty of a government to persecute heretics, to found monasteries, to make war on Saracens. But time advances; facts accumulate; doubts arise. Faint glimpses of truth begin to appear and shine more and more unto the perfect day.—Macaulay.

"AH, but," say you, "Protestantism gave her learning to the people, and Rome kept it to herself." And what learning, pray thee, did Protestantism giv to the people? The only learning she gave, and which Catholics refused, was that which can be culled from "an open Bible." And this is, of course, learning to be proud of—inexpugnable cosmogony, incontrovertible astronomy, and geology that cannot be questioned; and abundant sanctions for stealing, lying, murdering, slavery, polygamy, harlotry, and, perhaps, every crime of which human turpitude has ever been capable. This is the learning (save the mark) which Protestantism gave and which Catholicism wisely withheld. An "open Bible" is an open Pandora's box. Learning proper neither church has ever encouraged; and at this hour Catholicism is not more hostil than Protestantism to the fearless researches of science and the unbiased generalizations of philosophy. Catholicism and Protestantism—which of the two weird sisters is at present most amiably disposed to Charles Darwin's Evolution or to Herbert Spencer's Agnosticism?—Saladin.

IF we are born for heaven, we are lost for earth.—Feuerbach.

AT present let us remove what is bad, which must always be done before good of any kind can spring up.—W. S. Landor.

IF there is a devil, he is God's devil. Either this, or God is not infinit. If he is infinit, then there is nothing in the world which is not a fraction of his wholeness.—Chadwick.

No lie can speak or act, but it will come after longer or shorter circulation, like a bill drawn on nature's reality, and be presented there for payment, with the answer, No effects.—Carlyle.

WE want no men who will change, like the vanes of our steeples, with the course of popular wind; but we want men who, like mountains, will change the course of the wind.—Horace Mann.

JESUS had defects and imperfections like all other men, and it is but simple justice to him and all other men that these defects should be dispassionately pointed out, so that mankind may know the truth and be free—free from the thralldom of ancient superstition, free from the absurd idea that Jesus was a perfect man. He was a simple Jewish enthusiast and religious reformer, foolishly supposing himself the messiah, thereby coming to an untimely death.—W. E. Coleman.

PLEASURE is a shadow, wealth is vanity, and power is a pageant; but knowledge is intrinsic enjoyment, perennial fame, unlimited space, and infinit duration. In the performance of its sacred office it fears no danger, spares no expense, omits no exertion. It scales the mountain, looks into the volcano, dives into the ocean, perforates the earth, wings its flight into the skies, encircles the globe, explores sea and land, contemplates the distant, examins the minute, comprehends the great, and transcends the sublime. No place too remote for its grasp, no heavens too exalted for its touch.—De Witt Clinton.

THE originals [of the New Testament] do not anywhere exist, and consequently it is utterly impossible for anybody to know who wrote any one of the books of the Bible, which is, therefore, a compilation of anonymous writings, and as such is no authority whatever. So far from being a divinely-inspired record, it is, as we hav seen, a product of the cunning and ingenuity of knaves and fanatics, who deserve credit for only one thing, and that is that they managed to make any sense whatever out of the wretched scribble and scrawl from which they derived their information.—Dr. Hardwicke.

NOBODY has ever explained how it happens that when a New York politician seeks salvation and joins the church his creditors begin to get uneasy and want to hav an expert to examin his books.—Philadelphia Times.

SALOONKEEPER PETE SCHMIDT, of Jefferson City, allows nothing to interfere with his religious duties. Two weeks ago he closed up his saloon long enough to attend church in the morning. Pete is a particularly striking Christian.

THE army of the Vatican for the current year has two generals, two colonels, two subcolonels, one major, two captains, and four officers. The whole army officered by these dignitaries consists of sixty warriors, including the Swiss guard. The cavalry consists of thirteen noblemen, with eight horses between them.

THE headmaster of a large school in New York asserts that a girl of sweet sixteen or seventeen of the present age is taller and of better physical development than one of the last generation. According to the teacher, this improvement should be attributed to the prevalent practice of outdoor games and gymnastic exercises.

AN ungodly wretch stole $1,200 worth of silverware and jewelry from the residence of Rev. F. W. Clampelt, of Christ's church, Springfield, Ill., Sunday night while the dominie was in church trying to save sinners. Rev. Mr. Clampelt wishes now that he had laid up his treasures in heaven, but he would like to pelt the burglar just the same.

THE Rev. T. J. Shelton, editor of the Arkansas Christian and one of the most prominent clergymen in the South, has gone insane. He was arrested at Little Rock while attempting to resurrect the body of a young woman who recently died. Recently he announced that he was the messiah and declared that he was ordered to go to Kansas City with the wife of a prominent merchant, who is a member of his church.

THE new Talmage Tabernacle in Brooklyn was dedicated last Sunday. There were three services and at the last one Talmage spoke. On the day before the dedication the Recorder printed this:

> Talmage's house-warming
> Will begin to-morrow morning,
> When the church will be specially blest.
> It's to be a dedication
> For cash and consecration,
> If you send a check they'll do the rest.

I HAV listened to many Unitarian sermons, says an editorial writer in Secular Thought, but invariably with the same result. The beginning of the sermon leads directly on the road to reason; the revolt against orthodox crudities seems to hav opened one more intelligent mind; but suddenly a switch is turned and back we get on to the well-worn old road; and a prayer takes us back to realms not very far removed from those reigned over by Wild and Walsh.

A CURIOUS case lately came up before the court of appeals in Kazan, Russia. The son of Russian townsman (Miestshanin), a boy of eight years, playing with other boys in the street, made the sign of the cross over a Tatar boy, a Mohammedan. The Tatar boy ran away crying over the sacrilege, and complained to his father. The latter immediately went out, caught the Christian boy, and gave him a sound thrashing. The Russian father brought suit against him. The judge sentenced him to imprisonment.

CARDINAL TASCHEREAU and the other Quebec prelates say in their letter against the Manitoba prohibition of separate schools: "The church, being alone commissioned by God to teach men morals, cannot, at any period of their lives, abandon her mission. She is not free to renounce her action and control in the schools; under no conditions, under no form of government, can she approve schools wherein youth receives no moral instruction. Therefore she always has reproved and always will reprove the schools commonly styled 'unsectarian schools.'" It is to be borne in mind that the Catholic church under the head of "morals" includes political duties, and in fact about everything else.

To the weary worldling Lent must be welcome indeed, and to hav a truly fashionable and legitimate excuse to giv up striving must be an absolute relief to many. To the mother who has conscientiously struggled to every ball in order that her young daughter might see and be seen; to the father who feels that his girls hav "had their chance" for this winter at least and that he can now draw in the pursestrings; and even to the girls themselvs, who must experience a genuin sensation of relief in being able at least to stay home and take the much-needed rest without feeling that they are "out of it." The queer admixture of so-called religion and fashion that we hav nowadays would hav considerably astonished the apostles.—New York Tribune.

AT a meeting of the board of health of Riverhead, N. Y., lately, a resolution was adopted ordering Town Clerk John Bagshaw to make complaint before the grand jury at its next session against Father Patrick Creighton, the pastor of St. John's Catholic church, for violation of the law which requires every person who performs a marriage ceremony to file with the board of health a copy of the marriage certificate. Father Creighton went to St. John's less than a year ago from the church of Our Lady of the Victory in Brooklyn. In the time of his pastorate at Riverhead he has married a number of couples, but no certificate had been filed. Sometimes a certificate has been filed by the bridegroom, but even in such case it was not in the regular form of marriage certificates. Where the statutory form uses the words, "according to the laws of the state of New York," Father Creighton substitutes the words, "according to the rites of the Holy Catholic church." "I can't go against my conscience," says the priest. "The laws of the state recognize and grant divorces. The law of the church does not. For me the law of the church is supreme. As a part of the state law relating to marriage the right of divorce comes under the words in the form of marriage certificate, 'According to the laws of the state of New York.' Not recognizing the practice of divorce, we cannot recognize that form of marriage certificate or the law which requires us to file it."

Design Argument.

Design in the universe is the most potent factor in all discussions where Theism takes a part. It formulates a prearranged plan. It has a fixed, changeless purpose emphasizing every argument falling from the lips of all defenders of the faith once delivered unto the saints. The experiences of life lend their aid in support of such deliverance. From the crude attempts of primitiv man to fashion a club or in any way make an instrument of offense or defense, and on through the changes of a million years resulting in the multitudinous complex machines which disclose plans, designs—these, and the adaptations seen in all which tends to make up modern civilization, are in demonstration of Freethought. The entire history of our race is in support of the fact that design succeeds design, plan succeeds plan, and we are advised at every step of the adjustment, means, and measures which aim at the realization of objects of desire. All point toward the attainment of certain ends. Therefore it is not at all surprising that not only the ignorant and the unadvised but multitudes who claim to reason and enjoy the benefits of what is called an education, should reason in the same way. The pulpit also errs in relation to this question. It is wondrous strange that the most competent portion of the clergy fail to see the radical defect in the design argument which they formulate with such assurance—that the universe is a creation and that there is no way of accounting for it upon any other hypothesis than that of creation, which necessarily involves a creator. If the universe and its intelligent beings are only competent of a rational explanation upon the theory of an infinit intelligent being, then it must follow with increased emphasis that this infinit intelligent being must of necessity come through the same process which ushered into existence this wonderful universe.

It will be seen readily that Theism is not at liberty to set up the claim that this infinit creator did not come to be, but that he is eternal and hence self-existing. This would be to abandon the fundamental argument of Theism, which is design. If the intelligence of a bird is in evidence of a designer, much more must an infinit God be in evidence of a still higher designer. To deny this necessary demand is to compromise the argument used in the speech of Theism. There are many serious objections urged against the argument of theology. Design implies rationality. It necessarily involves a plan, a method, means aiming at an approved end or result. If it is infinit reason (whatever that is), then all the plans of that infinit reason would be founded in that reason and would be perfect. We hav no means of judging of the value, good or ill, of a design or plan only through that which the race has learned by the expensiv purchase of experience. Through such experience rules hav been slowly formulated through all of the ages of human development in relation to conduct. But through all of these ages these rules hav been subject to modification and change which higher experience has rendered necessary. Hence it is that when we institute a comparison of the rules of conduct of the long ago and those formulated by modern civilization we see a very marked difference—a difference so great that the sacred books of the distant ages are obsolete, are without any practical value as guides for the present age.

We hav as a result of human experience rules of conduct in the light of which it is manifest that certain acts put forth by rational beings are pronounced praiseworthy and other certain acts blameworthy, according to the design or plan of the actor. If the designs are in harmony with praiseworthy acts, these said acts are good; but if not, then they are pronounced bad. And we may well believe that this state of things alone renders society possible. We are placed under strict moral necessity to enforce the discrimination which these formulated rules of conduct emphasize. This applies to all premeditativ action, which necessarily implies intelligence. The advanced in intellectual and moral endowment cannot plead for any liberty not equally conceded to the less intellectually and morally endowed. If any distinctions were to be made, certainly they should be in favor of the latter class. If these rules cover the actual high and low they must in all attempts involving a process of reasoning applied to our ideals, otherwise reasoning would be a palpable fraud.

We must now make an application of these rules of conduct to our ideals, or divinities, otherwise we are left entirely in the dark. This infinit designer and creator must be judged in the light of his designs, which are clearly manifested and set forth in his creation, and by these are we compelled to make our estimate of this rational creator. What are the particular facts set forth in the reign and administration of this infinit creator, are we to consider, that his character may be vindicated. We hav clear ideas of power, wisdom, and goodness. Power is competent to do, wisdom is qualified to guide, and the moral element involved in goodness will see that no misuse is made of either power or wisdom. These are all fundamental in the infinit creator of the universe.

Now allow us to imagin, in the light of human experience, which has given us our rules for the judgment upon conduct and its regulation, in what class of facts we shall find the infinit creator's designs, plans, provisions, and methods vindicated. The universe in the presence of these revelations must be taken as the most fitting exponent of the character of the infinit creator. Every thoughtful student of nature must thoroughly understand that design has failed to discriminate or draw any line between virtue and vice, morality and immorality, good and evil. None of these are revealed in God's method seen in plan and design. The creation impresses the student with the conviction that in the management of this world good and evil are not factors at all.

It is useless to attempt to evade this argument upon the ground that this infinit creator has made a revelation not contained in his creation. This will not do. It is a fatal compromise. It is a surrender. That any really rational being should take the Bible as authority, with the innumerable liabilities to corruption and ruinous errors, as against the testimony set forth in creation where error and corruption is impossible, is hardly possible. It can only be done through the subjugating power of superstition, which dethrones reason.

If there is a plan, or design, a planner, or designer, which discriminates between virtue and vice, he, she, or it is nowhere to be found in the nature of the divine management. What does nature voice when we listen? The strong subjugate the weak. The big fish devours the small ones. The varying forms of organized life are living upon each other. One half of the structural forms liv on the other half. Think for a moment of the straits and the suffering that reign in all parts of this world, and then for a moment imagin that a being that is wise, powerful, and all-good would thus render the conditions of life such that one-half, if it livs at all, must liv on the quivering flesh of the other half. And the same is largely true in the history of human beings. Think—no, we cannot think, of the possibility of this world of sentient life being what it is as a result of a plan or design on the part of any being who is wise, good, and powerful. How could such a being endure the torture which a vision of the ceaseless suffering would produce when all seen at once? Torture, infinit torture, it must be to any intelligent existence of whom it is possible to predicate wisdom, power, and goodness. This universe of woe must annihilate every argument in the speech of Theism. Such a world as this in the light of its bloody history would knock out in the first round every vestige of a designing creator, infinit in power, wisdom, and goodness. If this world is planned, designed, by a God such as theology defines, we hav a legitimate right to demand that sorrow, suffering, and pain in every form shall forever cease—shall be excluded from the domain over which this God has jurisdiction. If not, we are compelled to deny the design argument and exclude the designer.

In the second place, if the universe is a creation, then before that universe there was no creator, but an infinit uncreator. Also, this infinit uncreator was alone, and is unchangeable. We must remember that he was just as old before he became creator as he is now, for he is eternal and has no succession. And yet the passage from an infinit uncreator to a creator, which implies succession, and hence a contradiction, has been made. Creation is a measured quantity, because it began, and that which begins is necessarily a measured quantity, and demands in strict logical necessity a cause only adequate to produce quantity; and quantity, being finite, limited, can hav as cause only that which stands related to it, and that is a limited cause, and not an infinit cause such as theology postulates. It is not conceivable that an infinit uncreator, being unchangeable, could become a creator, which involves change; and change breaks down the argument of Theism.

But this, in the next place, confronts us with another very serious difficulty. The time came when he was not an uncreator, and also when he was not an undesigner. He was, in fact, an undesigner from strict necessity, seeing that he was alone, and hence there was nothing for design to relate to. There was no universe, there was no creator, and hence there could hav been no design, for design implies something, as a necessary condition of design, but there was nothing, and design therefore was impossible. Theistic creation must hav taken place without design, and this is impossible; it is not conceivable. There being nothing for design to relate to, nothing for it to fall upon, it becomes an impossible conception itself. It is evident that if creation ever did take place, it must hav started with something, and as that something must hav been without design, if any something could hav come without design, then all somethings could hav come in the same way.

But it is flippantly asked, If the universe did not come in the theological way, how did it come? Though it should be impossible to answer this question, this in no sense confirms the theological postulate. It does not follow because we cannot tell the stuff out of which dreams are made, that therefore they are revelations of the gods. That a reasonable hypothesis can be suggested is supported by the best thought of this age. This is saying that which cannot be said of the hypothesis of Theism, for that in no sense is reasonable, but in all things quite the reverse.

The intolerable egoism with which Theism has invested man lies in the way of a correct rendering of the facts of this world. It compliments man in the terms which make him a co-factor in all plans and designs in the so called created universe. He is en rapport with the creator. He sees, hears, and talks with him. He imagins that he is the end and aim of design, and that all ends seen in the method of this creator culminate in him. The earth with its fullness was made for him. The sun also, as well as the moon and stars, were all created for his benefit. A divine trinity was called into existence to meet his needs, and Calvary's bloody victim was an offering for his sins and nothing more. A heaven and a hell are for him. The winds, the rains, the dews, are all for him. The cattle upon a thousand hills are for his benefit. The gold and silver, precious metals and rare gems, are all in honor of him. The coal-beds and forests, the wild beasts which roam therein, and the fish in a thousand streams, rivers, lakes, and oceans, are all in his interest. The birds of the air are all for his benefit. Such unpardonable claims set up by him make all forms of life his foes. He fails to see that he is only a link in the chain of life upon this globe, and that all other links in this chain dispute his claims, seeing that all forms of life hav like fundamental traits. Man has to contest his claims with all forms of life. All classes in the chain of organic life are alike egotistic and are alike foolish. The fish in the waters of this world deny that these waters were made for man—"they are and were created for us fishes." And the fishes show this fact by the way they will capture the man that ventures into their waters where some of the finny tribe show their shark teeth. They like the bloody flesh of their egotistic lord of creation as well as this same lord likes the result of his angling. The birds of the air reason in like manner: "This air is for us and all the good things in this world are for our benefit."

And the beasts of a thousand forests are of the same opinion. "All are for us, and we are at the head of the universe—all things created for our benefit." And thus it is as we run through the varying forms of life, until we encounter the little autocrat, the ant. He is inspired with the idea, as much as any Christian, that this world was created for his inheritance, for his benefit. He builds his little stalls, directed by inspiration, and with Christian deftness captures the little aphides, giving them stall-room, and then milks them, and thus has food for the little baby ants. They are comforted with the inspired thought that this world is for them, and if they do not hav it all to themselvs, they think that they are wronged out of their rights. They do not imagin any more than man does that there is anyone higher than they are.

Man's creators are never higher than man and his ideals. All forms of life can use the same arguments as man in the interest of design. And in the last analysis we find that design is never higher than the human possible. And in fact, all of the theological arguments are on the line of the human, and never go beyond. They first fashion their god after the human design, and take his measurement in the light of that design.

What Religion Shall be Taught in Our Public Schools?

AN APPEAL OF THE WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION TO THE COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS, ASSEMBLED IN CONVENTION AT OLYMPIA.

OFFICE OF THE WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION,
April 7, 1891.

GENTLEMEN: The Washington Secular Union, having auxiliary local Unions throughout the entire state, organized to protect its members and all other worthy citizens in the "absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment," as guaranteed by our state constitution, respectfully call your attention to and solicit your earnest consideration of the following facts and petition:

Our public schools are created and maintained by the civil government, and therefore are a civil, not a religious institution, and are not maintained in the interest of or in opposition to religion, nor in the interest of any sect or denomination, but of the people, by the people, for the people.

Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Infidels, all are taxed alike for its support, all hav equal rights, and no preference can justly be given to any one religion.

The greater part of a community may be agreed concerning some matter of conscience, but if only one among them holds a different opinion, his or her rights of conscience are just as sacred as those of all others, and must be respected.

Your attention is especially called to the fact that our state constitution is pledged not only not to interfere with that right, but to protect it.

Art. i, Sec. 11, reads: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual. No public money or property shall be appropriated for, or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

Liberty of opinion, liberty of worship, liberty in all matters pertaining to religion, is not a privilege created or awarded by the state, but a right inherent in the personality of the individual conscience. And the state of Washington by its constitution is pledged not only not to interfere with that right, but to protect it.

There is no executiv, no legislativ, no judicial power or authority in existence that has any right to decide for anyone what system of religion that person shall study, or read, or hear read, or what code or form of prayers they shall repeat or hear repeated, nor has the governor of the state, the legislature, or any department of the government any power in themselvs, still less can they confer on any others the power, to decide what constitutes the Bible; since the Bible of the mother church, the Douay or Roman Catholic version, is denounced by the Protestants, and the Protestant or King James version is denounced as heretical by the Roman Catholics.

Why should our public schools be made propaganda nurseries for Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, or Buddhists?

If it is right and just, when a majority of the school board are Protestants, that the religious exercises in the school shall consist in reading passages of the King James Bible, and repeating the Lord's prayer, will it not be equally right and just whenever a majority of the school board are Roman Catholics, for them to insist on reading such passages as they choose from the Douay, or Roman Catholic Bible, and repeating prayers to the Virgin Mary?

We respectfully suggest to your honorable body, that no number of persons, whether self-elected or appointed by government, possess any right to use coerciv means to restrain any student from the full enjoyment of any of the rights guaranteed to every individual by our state constitution, or to induce them to profess any religion, or practice any act of worship, or be made to even in seeming take part in, or by their presence (against their own free will, or that of their parents or guardians) sanction any religion, much less compel their presence at any religious exercise against which they hav conscientious objections.

You will observe that in our state constitution the exclusion is not of sectarian instruction, but of any religious exercise or instruction; and that under our constitution there is not even room for the contention made in the case of Weiss et al. vs. School District No. 8, in the city of Edgerton, Wis., decided by the supreme court of Wisconsin, March 18, 1890, and reported in volume 44 of the Northwestern Reporter, at page 967, to which your attention is respectfully called.

The reading of the Bible is religious instruction, and when the Bible is read and prayer offered or recited in a school, to that extent—as the supreme court of Wisconsin unanimously decided—that school becomes by such religious exercises and instruction a place of worship.

What constitutes worship at the ordinary Protestant church? Is it the sermon? No. The worship consists in reading the scriptures, the prayers, and the singing of the hymns of praise.

School tax is not collected for the purpose of propagating any religious faith; school-teachers are not employed to save souls, but to afford secular education, to instruct the pupils in what the teachers know, not what they guess. We respectfully suggest that the pupils can guess about the unknowable about as well as the teachers.

The teachers are paid from the public money—taxes—paid by the people of the state; and it is the duty of the teachers to impart instruction that shall qualify the pupils for useful, happy lives in this state. It is no part of the duty of teachers to giv instruction in regard to how to attain happiness in some foreign state, nor in some future state; that is the duty of the parents. The place for such instruction is not the public school, but the home, the Sunday-school, and the church. Inculcations of religious dogmas or doctrins are matters for the home or the church. They are matters with which the government has no concern, and which it cannot interfere in without uniting the functions of church and state in a manner and to a degree wholly repugnant to the spirit of American institutions.

Objections are made that this is to make our public schools "godless," "immoral;" the objection is absurd. The terms godless, immoral, cannot be applied with any more consistency to a public school because the Bible is not read and the Lord's prayer daily repeated therein, than it can to schools of phonography, telegraphy, or any of our business colleges, because the Bible is not read and the Lord's prayer not repeated as part of their regular exercises.

The state superintendent of public instruction, R. B. Bryan, under date of June 14, 1890, wrote: "The supreme courts of other states where the provisions of the constitution and laws are similar to ours hav decided that religious exercises cannot be conducted in connection with school work even to the repeating of the Lord's prayer."

"What objection can anyone hav to the children being taught to recite the Lord's prayer?"

It is religious instruction and forbidden by our state constitution.

But from a Christian standpoint it is objectionable, because it ignores Christ.

The Lord's prayer is of itself Antichristian, inasmuch as it teaches that we should go direct to "our father," as children to a parent needing no mediator, for the Lord's prayer utterly ignores Christ—makes not the faintest allusion to him, affords no hint of our having any need of a vicarious atonement or any use for either a savior or a redeemer.

It teaches that instead of trusting to Jesus to pay the penalty or to secure for us forgivness of sins, we should ask or rather demand forgivness of sins on our own merits. The exact language of the prayer is, "And forgiv us our sin, for we also forgiv everyone that is indebted to us" (Luke ii, 14).

It is contended that school boards hav a right to sanction religious exercises in public schools because of established custom.

We appeal to you that it is no excuse or justification for wrong-doing that the aggressor was but following the example of his predecessor. But whatever pretext or shadow or coloring of law there might hav been for permitting religious exercises in the public schools in the past, it certainly no longer exists, for at the framing of our state constitution this subject was fully considered and freely discussed, and the provisions of Art. i, Sec. 11, hereinbefore quoted were inserted, and by an overwhelming majority those wise, reasonable, and just provisions were adopted.

The officers and members of the Washington Secular Union are each and all most stanch and devoted friends of our public schools, regarding them as the bulwarks of American independence and the only sure reliance for the perpetuation of our republic.

We therefore petition your honorable body, now in convention assembled, to pass resolutions expressiv of your determination to enforce obedience to the constitution in this matter, "affording absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment and belief to every individual," to insure which you each and all, as the county superintendents of schools, positivly prohibit any religious worship, exercise, or instruction in connection with school work in any public school of the state.

By order of the board of directors of the Washington Secular Union. C. B. Reynolds, Secretary.

Belief in the Existence of a God the Curse of Mankind.

Of all the superstitions which debase and dwarf the mind of man there is none so prolific of evil as the belief in the existence of a God. It is the instrument by which the poor and ignorant multitude are compelled to endure the cruel injustices and outrages which stain the pages of the nineteenth century literature as well as of the history of all past ages. Begotten of ignorance of the nature and laws of the external universe, the belief in an omnipotent and omniscient agency external to, and independent of, nature itself, has been perpetuated and disseminated by crafty and selfish political rulers and their indispensable allies, the priests, for their own welfare and glory.

After almost nineteen hundred years of so-called Christian teaching and effort we see around us what? The mass of the people in rags or approximately so, and the vultures and parasites of society—priests, ministers, thieves, and monopolists—gorged with their ill-gotten wealth. Side by side with high-spired marble church edifices may be seen the tenement and the factory, the one stunting the intellect, the others weakening and preventing the full development of the body.

But, it will be asked, how can the belief in a God be held responsible for the wretchedness and misery by which we are surrounded? History furnishes the answer in the story of the past. When the mental faculties of man had sufficiently developed to enable him to appreciate the instability of his environment and his absolute dependence for support upon conditions which were not within his power to modify to any great extent, he naturally ascribed as the cause of the phenomena which he witnessed agencies which were essentially anthropomorphic. The roaring of the wind, the rain storm, the thunder which made him tremble, and the lightning which oft-times perhaps destroyed his forest home, were all, to primitiv man, manifestations of the power of unseen Gods, whose actual existence he could not for a moment doubt. Thus it was that man's ignorance of his environment gave birth to the conception of spiritual beings who controled the phenomena of the material universe. This superstitious notion of invisible anthropomorphic agencies, or, as its modern development exists to-day throughout the nations of the earth, the belief in a God, has disastrously retarded the social, industrial, and intellectual advancement of mankind. In all ages the priestly class hav perpetuated their ecclesiastical as well as political influence by appealing to this superstitious sentiment, which, even in the shadow of the truths which science has revealed, is still sufficiently potent to fill the churches with the effeminate-minded of both sexes.

Were it not for the priestly Januses, who hav deluded the people with the hope of a heavenly paradise if they are only loyal and liberal enough to the church, the majority of mankind would not be as they are to-day, praying for those who are robbing the people of all that makes life worth living. The priest and the professional politician are the precursors of intellectual and social slavery, whether their presence pollute the atmosphere of a republic or of a monarchy. Hand in hand they travel together, the one promising a post-mortem picnic with God and the winged tribe of heaven in return for as much of your salary as you can afford to spare; and the other vowing that he will relieve you of the burden of excessiv and unnecessary taxation if you will only contribute the remainder of your income to his support. The agent of God teaches the necessity of absolute and unquestioning obedience to temporal and spiritual rulers, and also expatiates upon the blessings of poverty and humility; though he himself enjoys the comforts of opulence. The politician realizes the usefulness of this kind of "moral" teaching in enabling him to retain his grip upon the public collar and treasury, and encourages the dissemination of these views by exempting church property from its equitable share of taxation, and granting the most valuable tracts of the people's land for church purposes. Would there be such poverty and misery as may be witnessed among the working classes of all lands if the church had not sided with the rich and unscrupulous in the task of despoiling the people of their rights? And would the church hav so powerful an influence over the people if their mind was not fettered with the fatal belief in a heavenly despot, the keys to whose monarchy are in the possession of religious bigots and fanatics?

It is not contended here, however, that there are not many honest and sincere men and women who believe in the existence of a God, but the evidence upon which they base their belief is insufficient and unworthy of the scientific era in which we liv. The indestructibility of matter, and inferentially the eternity of its duration, is now capable of complete and satisfactory demonstration, thanks to the exhaustiv labors of those eminent philosophers of the past and the present who hav spent their lives in the search after truth. Physics and chemical analysis are hourly disclosing to the popular comprehension the fact that matter itself is possessed of all the properties necessary to the generation and development of all organic life. Bearing these facts in mind, it may be well maintained that it is no longer excusable to cling to a belief which has been rejected by the greatest thinkers of the nineteenth century.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Harry Powers.

What the Bigots Say.

The establishment by a Christian commonwealth of a system of public schools which is Christian but not sectarian, in which an open Bible is maintained as the standard of morals and the fountain of such religious knowledge as it is needful the citizen should know, and in which the facts of history are taught impartially, with regard only to the claims of truth, works no injustice to any citizen.—Christian Statesman.

Another effort is being made to open the Metropolitan Museum of Art on the Sabbath. This one is being made by women who, believing a half loaf is better than nothing, ask for its opening on Sabbath afternoon. Yet they must be ashamed of their course, for they do not disclose their identity. There is absolutely no need for this request. The museum is open two evenings each week, and no admission fee is charged. The plea that the working people are too tired then to avail themselvs of this opportunity will not hold. Let there be the desire to profit by what is there displayed, and weariness will not prevent the seeker after knowledge from attending.—Christian Instructor.

Historical study shows the Bible wonders to be of the same character as those recorded in the religious books of all other nations; and literary criticism proves it to abound in errors, inconsistencies, and contradictions, showing it to be the word of man.—Robt. C. Adams.

The Cause in Washington.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

In making the appeal and sending petitions to the county superintendents of public schools, while they were in convention at Olympia, asking them to pass resolutions that they would instruct school boards to insist on all teachers obeying the state constitution and stop all religious exercises in connection with school work, I had only hoped at best to induce them to discuss the subject and realize something of the gross injustice of forcing upon the children religious instruction repugnant to the convictions of their parents and antagonistic to their church and home instruction.

But I am pleased to be able to report that the state superintendent of public instruction, R. B. Bryan, who was chairman of the convention, appointed a committee to examin and report on the petition. The said committee reported a resolution decidedly in favor of the enforcing of the provisions of the constitution, but the fanatics and those afraid of Mrs. Grundy managed to table the resolution. I am, however, assured by one of the superintendents present that "the sentiment of the convention was in favor of the enforcing of the provisions of the constitution, and I hav no doubt but that such a course will be followed."

SUNDAY LAWS.

At Tacoma the ordinance prepared by the Sunday fanatics, under the direction of Wily Crafts and the American Sabbath Union, by which baseball and all other amusements were to become criminal offenses, although drawn up so carefully that the ordinance was declared of binding force and in harmony with the rights and powers of the council to enact—at least such was the opinion delivered to the council by the city attorney—was defeated.

The fanatics who cause arrest of persons for having their places of business open on Sunday in Tacoma hav learned that they must themselvs pay the costs. This last ordinance asked for was to make the city responsible for all costs of such arrests and prosecutions.

I expect the pamphlet on "Facts in Regard to Sunday Laws and Sabbath Observance" will be out the first of next week. The Washington Secular Union will judiciously, through its vice-presidents, distribute five thousand copies throughout the state, and thus educate the people to a clear understanding of the question.

We hav the glad tidings that one of the most able law firms in the state will hereafter act as the legal advisers of our board of directors—Liberals who will do all possible to help the cause at smallest possible outlay—workers for love of right and freedom, and not for lucre only.

The only drawback to our work is the want of funds. Surely it needs only this fact should be known to those able to help to secure their prompt action. The treasurer's address is Mrs. Mary E. Boman, Fremont, Wash.

Anacortes will be one of the most important cities of the sound. It has the geographical position, and the progressiv, wide-awake, enterprising citizens, to make it so. I delivered three lectures here, April 11th, 12th, and 13th. I found a very large Liberal element. I lectured at the theater. Each audience doubled in numbers the preceding one. On the last (Monday) night over sixty had to stand during the entire lecture. To that earnest worker and veteran in good works, Martin H. Willfong, of Guemes—across the sound from Anacortes—the Liberals are indebted for the effort made. He assumed the responsibility and made all the arrangements, ably and most willingly seconded by the friends; it proved that there are very many more genuin Liberals in Anacortes than anyone had ever supposed.

I hope soon to hav the privilege and happiness of again visiting Anacortes, or of what perhaps would prove more effectiv, sending our field secretary there. Another course of lectures will beyond doubt result in the formation of a strong local Union. Already they hav started the work of gathering funds to build a Freethought hall and establish a free Liberal and scientific library.

OUR FIELD SECRETARY.

Let it be understood our field secretary does not receive any salary, either in fact, or in promises or forlorn hopes. This luxury is extended to the secretary only. But in any place in the state where there are only a few Liberals, or where there is need of lectures or help in forming local organization, if the Liberals of the place are unable to bear all the expenses, if the facts are made known to the secretary (Lock-box No. 5, Fremont, Wash.), the matter will at once be laid before the directors, and if they approve, our field lecturer will be sent to do the needed work, and such part of the cost as the Liberals of the place cannot meet will be paid by the directors from the field secretary lecture fund. So the field secretaries pay only for work actually performed, at reduced rates, agreed upon by the board of directors. Subscriptions to this especial fund are solicited. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.

Mrs. Besant in Washington City.

A reception was given in honor of Mrs. Annie Besant under the auspices of the Wimodaughsis society at the house of Miss Adelaide Johnson, in Washington, D. C., Sunday afternoon, April 19th. Among the numerous callers were Mr. and Mrs. W. Burr. On being introduced to Mrs. Besant, Mr. Burr said: "Had you come to Washington a dozen years ago, when you were under a cloud, I would hav been just as ready to welcome you as now, when the common people of England seem to be ready, should an opportunity be ready, to make you their queen."

"I hope, said Mrs. Besant, "that I may never suffer such a degradation."

The change in public opinion in regard to this lady is strikingly indicated by the fact that the Washington Post in September, 1880, in animadverting on the congress of Freethinkers at Brussels said:

There were those who upheld the wildest schemes of revolution, others who would cut loose from the restraints of society and set up a saturnalia of self-license in its place. . . . The only point of harmony around which they seem to revolve was the slip-shod morality of the Freethinking and obscene English woman.

The same paper now speaks only in praise of Mrs. Besant, saying that she is perhaps the most popular woman in England to-day. Stilson Hutchins was the proprietor and ostensible editor of the Post in 1880, and at the same time an unsuccessful aspirant for a Democratic nomination for Congress in New Hampshire. The ownership of the paper has changed since 1880. Mr. Hutchins was never the real editor, and one of his writers is said to be now employed on the paper. It is to be hoped that Mr. Sylvester did not write that disgraceful editorial.

The New Orleans Affair.

The communication of Edwards Rousseau would need no reply had it appeared in any other journal than THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will be as brief as possible and quote as little as I can under the circumstances. He commences with a string of suppositions from which he draws analogies between the butchery of the Italians in New Orleans and what should hav happened in New York under similar conditions. He supposes:

Suppose Superintendent Murray had been ambushed and assassinated by a secret league of cutthroats because in the execution of his duty he was trying to the best of his ability to elevate American law and order above the reign of organized criminal conspiracy.

Now, you may as well look to the church to elevate law and order as to the police, presuming the church and police, in the present state of society, to be a necessary evil to be tolerated. Yet the very terms hav become synonymous with the words defaulter in the upper, and thief in the lower, walks of life. He says:

I know if I had been in New Orleans that day, and had possessed sufficient courage, I would certainly hav slung a musket over my shoulder and followed Parkerson's lead.

Certainly it cannot require much courage to whip a horse tied in his stall, physical or mental.

But sniveling over spilt milk has never yet done any good.

This in allusion to the dead in their cells. Yet that remains to be seen. The brutality of this expression would do honor to God, when he says to the ninety and nine, "Depart ye cursed."

If the jury had done their duty as they were sworn to do, the more or less lamentable occurrence would never hav happened.

Who were the best judges of this matter, the jury who sat through a long and tedious trial, hearing the evidence discussed and sifted as evidence is sifted in courts, or you?

Italian residents propose to get all they can out of this country and giv in return nothing but abuse and treason. It is not putting the case one iota too strongly to say that nine out of every ten Italian immigrants are a curse and a pest to this country.

The Italian resident will get nothing out of this country except through toil, which he seems willing to perform. Italy has been at the expense of his support until he has become a producer, and America is getting the products of his labor.

The Italian immigration of to-day, like that of the Hungarian and Polish, is very largely composed of paupers, criminals, etc.

What other class can hav any inducement to leave home and all its endearments?

They commit numerous deeds of violence, and in proportion to their numbers giv the police more trouble than any other of our foreign residents.

Hav you reference to the excise law? Are the police Irish, and do they antagonize with the Italians? Who congregate at the corner of liquor saloons? Not Italians.

It is most cheerfully admitted that some Italians make good and law-abiding citizens, but a large majority of them are, by reason of their ignorance, their customs, their slavish allegiance to the pope or King Humbert, and, above all, their propensity to deeds of crime and violence, unfitted to liv in a country of the character of the United States.

Can they be more slavish to the pope or king than the American is to his party or his church? "A country of the character of the United States"—bah! This is putting on conceit with a vengeance—two presidents of this country hav been assassinated, two more hav died so suddenly and under such circumstances as to leave a taint.

It is conceded, I take it, that in a republic the ballot is the true and proper remedy for existing evils. But if we put the ballot, that most potent weapon, into the hands of the unlettered and ignorant hordes who know nothing of our systems or institutions, and care almost infinitly less, who regard election time as the heaven-inspired day in which they can make a couple of dollars in a couple of minutes——

Who else but the unlettered and ignorant hav ever done the voting in this country? Does the Fifth avenue man vote? Did the poor voter ever make anything out of his vote, except to sell it? Was there ever a president elected by honest votes? Hav you forgotten the "Credit Mobilier?"

Let all intending immigrants file a declaration of their intention to come to this country with the American consul nearest to their homes, say, not less than two years previous to the date of their departure. It should be made a part of the consul's duties to thoroughly investigate the character of the intending immigrant, his financial condition, and require such other information as may be deemed necessary and desirable. If the examination is satisfactory to the consul he should be required to giv the intending immigrant a certificate stating the bearer was a fit person to become a resident of the United States.

Well, really, this would be a nice bone for the consuls. We doubt if the immigrant would hav much left to get him here.

When the immigrant lands make him thoroughly understand that if in five years he is not able to read the organic law of his adopted country, the Constitution of the United States, he will be shipped back to the country from whence he came.

Your limit is original. Reminds me of the patient who wished to make a contract with his doctor to cure him of the diabetes within a given period.

America, invincible America, will rise in the majestic might of her too sorely tried and outraged patience, and all good and loyal Americans, regardless of creed or race, will unite shoulder to shoulder to save and perpetuate the American nation as they united thirty years ago to-day to save and perpetuate the American Union.

This is good. You take them all in now—rag-tag and bobtail—something like the Universalist heaven.

It is in bad keeping to object to immigration in a country but a little over one hundred years a government, and a little over three hundred years ago undiscovered—indeed, are we not all immigrants?—is it not immigrants who hav brought the country to its present prosperity? Is one to blame for the spot he is born on? And after he is born, should he not hav the privilege of living on what part of the earth he wishes, if he does not trespass on individual rights? Hav the immigrants ever shown the nativ American (the Indian) any mercy? His hunting-grounds are gone, and to-day he is at the jumping-off place. GEORGE M. DAVENPORT.

Pious Lying.

How few so-called Christians read the Holy Bible. If they did, Christianity from the start must justify the most monstrous lying or worst of common sense. When a person calling him or herself a Christian tells us they hav read and believe every word of it, they can be safely set down as bare-faced liars; and to prove it, it is only necessary to point to its numerous absurdities and contradictions, if read with ordinary observation. The first book, Genesis, in chapter vi speaks of a multiplicity of Gods; and of the "sons of God"—that they saw the daughters of the sons of men and they took wives of such as they chose.

Perhaps I am wrong, however, as to the book speaking of the "sons of God," and it really means pulpit divines choosing wives of the sons of men, as now.

Why the Christian of the New Testament should endeavor to strengthen his pretensions and faith by hugging to his bosom this old Jewish history, seems to me marvelous.

The New Testament is based upon the naked fact that Jesus was the only son of God; that he was crucified at Jerusalem, which the Jews flatly deny. But lying, assumption, deception, and superstition seem to be the component parts of what is called piety. D. B.

Brooklyn.

A Voice from the West Indies.

Since my last nothing has happened here of any importance. The census is just about being taken, and a circular has been addressed to all Freethinkers, as this census is a religious one, asking them to conscientiously write in the space allotted to religion their true opinions. This census has caused an open warfare between the Roman Catholics and Anglicans, as both parties claim to be in the majority.

Some time ago I read in a West India newspaper that British Honduras, Central America, has given birth to a Freethought society. The Guardian newspaper of that place commenting on the movement called them a set of boys forming an Infidel association.

I hav just been reading in a Portuguese religious review of 1870 a curious article on the Freethinkers' council which was held in Naples in the month of December of that year. The following is a translation:

The same people of the "infernal banquet," which was celebrated in Paris, pretend also to celebrate a conventicle in Naples. The vicar of the devil on earth has already dispatched his letters of convocation. Those addressed to Ricciardi are as follows:

CAPRERA, January 10th.

MY DEAR RICCIARDI: Reunite in December proximo, in Naples, the Freetninkers. It is a true, grand work, and I desire very much that we realize it.

With such a project we intend to extinguish the sacerdotal gangrene with which we are infected.

I am yours, G. GARIBALDI.

God permit that the ministers of Satan may make such sad and significativ parodies to the sacred functions and to the assemblies and practices of the Catholics, so that the world may compare, for example, the Fridays of Lent, which Pius IX. spends in holy devotion, with the "infernal banquets" celebrated drunkenly by the Freethinkers, who are convocated by Garibaldi to meet in Naples, on the same occasion, in which hundreds of bishops will reunite. Compare and judge.

This shows at once the difference in opinion which existed and which exists now—and not very long ago, only twenty-one years. E. S.

Whom the Spirits Join Together, They Can Put Asunder.

Dispatch from Boston, April 21st, to the New York Sun.

Spirits formed a very important factor in a divorce case which was heard in this city to-day before Judge Staples. They ordered the marriage in the first place, and then ordered the tie broken, and the man and woman obeyed without a murmur.

The couple are William Peck, the Spiritualist lecturer, who brings suit for divorce, and Sarah G. Vetter, better known as Mrs. H. S. Lake, speaker at the First Spiritual Temple. Her maiden name was Sarah Genervа Chafa, and her life as unfolded to-day has been eventful.

When a mere girl it became a part of her creed that a married woman has an unalienable right to her person, her property, and her name, and she has advocated those ideas ever since. That accounts for the different names of the couple.

This is the story which is told: When Mrs. Lake was seventeen years old, she started out to make her own living. In three years she drifted to New York, studied elocution, and gave a series of dramatic recitals with good success.

She met a young and handsome Catholic priest, Henry S. Lake. It was a case of love at first sight. He renounced his religion for the purpose of marrying her and they lived together for two years.

He died early in 1876. She was overwhelmed with grief until a medium gave her an opportunity to commune with her departed spouse. Her spirit husband told her to enter the lecture field.

She obeyed. After lecturing nearly two years she met Professor Peck. The spirits still guided her actions, and, acting under their instruction, she proposed marriage under the following contract of co partnership, written by her, and signed in the presence of witnesses by both:

MARRIAGE CONTRACT.—We, the undersigned, hereby enter into copartnership on the basis of the true marriage relation. Recognizing love as the only law which should govern the sexual relationship, we agree to continue this copartnership so long as mutual affection shall exist, and to dissolve it when the union becomes disagreeable or undesirable to either party. We also agree that all property that shall be acquired by mutual effort shall be equally divided on the dissolution of said copartnership. Should any children result from the union, we pledge ourselvs to be mutually held and bound to provide them support whether the union continues or is dissolved.

Given under our hand and seal this 5th day of October, 1877. MRS. JENNIE LAKE,
WM. F. PECK.

Witnessed by—Without approval, J. B. Garrison; with approval, Mrs. J. A. Palmer.

This marriage contract was a surprise to the court and spectators, and created a decided sensation. For eleven years Mr. Peck and Mrs. Lake lived together as husband and wife, traveling all over the country lecturing on matters pertaining to spirits.

The spirit still acted as the guardian of the couple. In 1888 the spirits thought Mr. Peck and Mrs. Lake had lived together long enough, and so they ordered Mrs. Lake to sever the marital bonds which held them.

Mrs. Lake followed the dictates of her spirit guides. She told Professor Peck of the commands she had received from the spirit world. He is a pronounced Spiritualist, but he did not like this phase of the situation.

He pleaded hard with his wife, but she cared more for the spirits than for her husband. He wrote her several letters imploring her return, but they did not move her. She responded with a long letter, which she took pains to say was dictated by her spiritual guides, and she desired him, when he read it, to "rise out of those states of the body which becloud the soul into the spirit of things." His pleadings for her mortal self called forth this response:

You hav always acted on the hypothesis that spirits were not able to discover the motivs and movements of mortals, and to convey information regarding the same. This is evidently something you hav yet to learn. By and by you will be relieved of those painful mental states and will recognize the wisdom of this event, and will, I know, if you will but make strenuous efforts, rise to higher and better stages of living, reaping both spiritual and material advantages which hav never before been yours. I know how hard it seems for you, with your nature, to believe what I hav written, but I feel satisfied, if you will but graciously accept the situation, after a time you will reap much advantage from the environment under which you will be placed. Your powers will be called out, your resources developed, and you will be brought into contact with persons who will be of service and satisfaction to you.

In regard to any immediate inquiries which may be made by people relativ to me or my work, the guide suggests that it will be wise to reply that I am passing through a new development for a special work, and that I am taken to such places and environed by such conditions as far as possible as will be conduciv to these ends. That you yourself realize how important it is that you should acquiesce in the desires of the guides, who hav proven themselvs wise and efficient guardians of an instrument who from childhood has striven to coöperate with her spirit instructors.

Judge Staples listened to the reading of this letter with a good deal of interest. Then he said that he viewed the contract simply as a contract, with no evidence of marriage. "She has simply carried out the terms of the contract." The court added: "I do not question the desertion, but I hav some doubts as to whether this is a marriage. It is, to my mind, just the same as though a man and woman met upon the street and agreed to liv together as husband and wife for a day, a month, or a year. The fact that it is in writing makes no particular difference. An oral contract would be just as good." The court finally took the case under advisement.

The Trustees in Session.

The chairman called the meeting to order, and after prayer had been offered by Trustee Littlesoul, the board united in singing the hymn which begins:

And every day will be Sunday over there.

Trustee Grabitall reported several munificent gifts and bequests from public-spirited citizens to the Metropolitan Museum in trust for the people of New York. These were unanimously accepted, and each trustee winked the other eye.

The finance committee reported that it had audited and ordered paid the bill of expenses for keeping the museum open Sundays for the benefit of the trustees and their acquaintances. As this expenditure caused a deficit in the treasury it was recommended that for the next two months the museum be kept open only one evening a week instead of two. The report was accepted and the recommendation adopted.

Trustee Kerr stated that he had overheard the third assistant janitor remark to a policeman that it was a shame the people down in his ward never had a chance to see the inside of the museum. He moved that the offending janitor be discharged at once without a recommend. Carried.

Trustee Goodheart rose in his place and begged leave to make a few remarks. He stated that he felt diffident on account of his youth in offering suggestions to men older than himself, and who were looked up to as being representativ of the better elements in the community. But from his personal observation in other cities, both abroad and in this country, and from conversation with the progressiv, wide-awake men of the day, not only business men but men who were well known for their practical and useful philanthropy, men who loved their fellowmen, he was forced to the conclusion that the trustees were, in one particular at least, pursuing a mistaken course. Furthermore, from the point of view of public policy, he thought the trustees were making a mistake. Every large city contains turbulent and dangerous elements which are increased both in number and kind because their minds hav nothing elevating to dwell upon, and are perforce turned into lower channels. Knowing these things and knowing that he and his associates had in their keeping a tremendous means of popular education, and that they held it only as a sacred trust for the people, he would move that hereafter the Metropolitan Museum of Art be thrown open to the public on Sundays.

Chairman Narrowmind sprang to his feet and called the trustee to order. He stated that that question had been settled once for all, and it was nothing short of impertinence for the trustee to allude to it. He supposed that next the trustee would actually dare to bring a copy of Life into the sacred edifice.

Trustee Littlesoul hoped and prayed, although he greatly doubted, that the Lord would forgiv Brother Goodheart for his blasphemous remarks. It seemed to him that a man guilty of such wicked sentiments could not possibly escape the sulphurous flames and other torments of eternal punishment. As for himself, he should look down from his place among the angels upon his erring brother in the place below with infinit pity, but, he could not help confessing, with equal contentment and triumph.

Trustee D'Onki stated that he was surprised. "Them pictures," he said, "cost money. Do we want rag, tag, and bob-tail comin' in here and lookin' at 'em? No, sir. What do the laborin' people want o' pictures, anyway? They couldn't tell a Rafael from a Titan, or a Mike Angelo from a Joan of Arc. First thing you know we'd be havin' people up here from Mulberry street and all them disreputable neighborhoods. We'd hav people that never seen a pictur' in their lives. No, sir. Sunday's the Lord's day, an' it's a day of rest. Let them people stay down in their tenement houses and rest."

Trustee Mewl said that he stood with Trustee D'Onki on this question and, as usual, they both stood firm. The Metropolitan Museum, he stated, was a respectable institution and was considered a great convenience by the friends and relativs of the trustees. To hav it opened to the public on Sundays would bring to it a lot of people who were not acquaintances of the families of the trustees and whom they did not care to meet. Some of these people would be shabbily dressed and doubtless some of them would smell of onions. They would feel far more at home in the saloons downtown, and that was the proper place for them.
